But these things have got to be settled; these monopolies have got to be dealt with with courage; make no mistake about that. It is not enough merely to tell the laboring men of this country, organized or unorganized, that they shall not do this or they shall not do that—and they can not be permitted to disorganize the public service. Our citizens do not always analyze and see clearly the problems of government. They are only human beings who are feeding women and children and housing them. They have appealed to Congress to look into the question of the high cost of living. They have not told us exactly how to correct it. They do not see clearly themselves. It is a thing which greatly perplexes the whole country. It not only perplexes the laboring man but it perplexes Congress. Congress does not know exactly what to do about it; Congress has not solved it. It will require all of the wisdom and all of the patriotism of the people of the United States and of the people of the world to solve these problems along lines of justice and righteousness; but they have got to be solved. I am in favor of this Congress devoting itself as speedily as possible to dealing with monopolies and finding a way to handle them, and dealing with the other questions which affect the cost of living fundamentally.

I think that the question of supply and demand has much to do with it. We have got to increase the supply. We have got to create the means of making this country more productive than it has been. We have got to take away the power of those who restrict artificially production in this country. I say that they do restrict unfairly the making of cement when they organize a group to control the price and the manufacture and distribution of that great material which is so necessary to give shelter to men. In New Zealand I understand that the Government furnishes cement practically at cost to the agricultural classes. Where a man has a family he can get the cement with which to build his house on 30 years' time, and at a low rate of interest, with an amortization plan by which he can build his own house, save himself rent, and give himself shelter. In that way the land is made more productive, and the output of agriculture is improved. But these things have got to be worked out; it is not enough merely to complain. We have got to find the means to this end, and we should waste not a day in idle debate.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, under Title III, in section 1, page 43, line 22, before the word "used," to strike out "That when" and insert "When," so as to read:

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to amend by adding after the word "hospital," in line 12, on page 48, the words "or sanatorium." I do not know whether the word "hospital" would cover sanatoriums, as it has a specific meaning. The intent of the committee was to let sanatoriums as well as hospitals have this alcohol.

Mr. STERLING. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 3, to change the number of the section from 14 to 15; in the same line, before the word "operates," to strike out "That whoever" and insert "Whoever"; and in line 8, before the word "violates," to insert "otherwise," so as to make the section read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. In line 8, page 14, I move to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. In line 3, page 17, I move to strike out the word "presented" and insert in lieu thereof the word "preserved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that it will be necessary for the Senator first to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to be amended was adopted.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I see that this occurs in an amendment, and I therefore move a reconsideration of the vote by which this amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment, beginning with line 15, on page 16, and ending with line 9, on page 17, was agreed to, will be reconsidered. The Senator from South Dakota proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment, on page 17, line 3, by striking out the word "presented," the third word in the line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "preserved."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. In line 22, page 12, I move to strike out the number "30," and insert in lieu thereof the number "29." This is the number of the section to which reference has been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I move to amend section 17, on page 24, by adding at the end of the section the proviso which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, at the end of section 17, it is proposed to add, after the word "articles," the last word in line 25, a colon and the following words:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act or in the act making appropriations for the Post Office Department approved March 3, 1917 (39 Stats. L., Pt. I, p. 1058, etc.), shall apply to newspapers published in foreign countries when mailed to this country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say just a word in explanation of that amendment. The Secretary of State calls attention to the situation, namely, that in a foreign newspaper, for the purposes of circulating it at home, there may be a liquor advertisement. The bill as we have it would preclude the circulation of any such paper in this country at all. I do not think it is intended that we should prohibit the circulation of foreign newspapers which are permitted to carry liquor advertisements in their own country because they happen to get into this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on page 18, line 8, after the word "issue," I move to insert the following words after the comma: "the purposes for which it is to be used."

Mr. STERLING. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question in reference to the penalties. I notice that on page 3—and the same thing is true of the penalties throughout the bill—it is provided that the fine shall not be less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not less than 30 days or more than one year or both. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the measure if the committee considered the question of changing the word "or" to "and," and making the penalty so that there would be both a fine and imprisonment?

I have found in my experience in prosecuting for some four years where we had a prohibitory liquor law, when it was new in the State, that it was almost impossible to drive people out of the liquor business where the law provided for a fine or imprisonment. Many courts would assess only a fine, and a fine would not drive the people who were engaged in that kind of business out of it. When the law was amended, and it provided for a penalty of not less than $100 and not less than 30 days' imprisonment, we had no trouble in enforcing the law and in driving all classes out of the business except the bootlegger who sprang up from time to time.

I believe that if this law is to be successfully enforced it is necessary to provide in the law that there shall be imprisonment as well as a fine, and I am going to move to strike out the word "or," on page 3, line 7, and insert the word "and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and," so that if amended it will read:

shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and be imprisoned for not less than 30 days or more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. CURTIS. If that is agreed to I shall move to strike out the words "or both" later on.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have some hesitation about agreeing to that amendment. I think in making this in the alternative, either a fine or imprisonment or both such fine and imprisonment, we follow a very general practice. There may be many cases wherein the fine, even the minimum fine, would be sufficient, or, anyhow, the maximum or something approaching the maximum fine.

I think we would be safe in leaving it to a Federal court to determine what the punishment should be. I do not think a Federal court would be influenced by local prejudices or local considerations, as perhaps a State court might be. I think they will mete out the punishment under the terms of the bill as it now is according to the just deserts of the man found guilty. I do not believe that we should make this now, at the beginning, both fine and imprisonment, as is contemplated by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The House had this bill under consideration, and very earnest consideration, for some weeks, and they agreed on these penalties, and I believe it would be the part of prudence, and that so far as the enforcement of the law is concerned, too, to let the penalties stand as they are.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is true that in most of the States when prohibitory liquor laws were first enacted the law provided for a fine or imprisonment, but after the laws had been on the statute books some little time the laws were changed and were made mandatory that the courts should impose a fine and imprisonment. I want to say to the Senator that in many parts of Kansas it was almost impossible to keep the little saloons closed until the law was changed, and a penalty was provided of fine and imprisonment. After the change was made the law was enforced in the State as it never had been enforced before, and as time goes on they have made the penalty more severe, and the law has been more successfully enforced.

I note what the Senator said in reference to the United States district courts. It seems to me that the decisions already rendered by United States courts in different sections of the country show that there are many United States district judges who will impose the very lowest penalty and will not try to enforce this law. We already have United States district courts who have held that 2½ per cent is not intoxicating, when every man who has had any experience in the enforcement of the liquor laws of the country knows that 2½ per cent will intoxicate. Yet we have had courts hold that it would not intoxicate.

Therefore I ask that the proposed amendment be adopted. I think it will help in the enforcement of the law. If we are going to have the law upon the statute books, there is no use in having it a dead letter. Let us fix it so it will be enforced and will be obeyed. There are people in every community who will not obey the law unless there is a jail penalty attached. If we attach a jail penalty, they will obey the law. I ask that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I trust the amendment will not prevail. There are no open saloons, or, to paraphrase a celebrated saying, there are no open saloons openly arrived at. The institution has disappeared from this country. Where they do exist, and perhaps there are some in the crowded cities, they are under the ban and are permitted to keep open either by the connivance or by the direct encouragement of the local State authorities.

The provisions of this act are extremely drastic, and I think sufficiently so, to say nothing of the force of public opinion, to carry with them the assurance that there are going to be no open saloons to be suppressed. There will be bootlegging, of course. That will go on, no matter what the provisions of the statute may be, and it will continue whether the punishment is fine and imprisonment or fine or imprisonment. The fine here may be $1,000, the imprisonment may be one year, and many of these offenses might be and would be out of all proportion to the act itself. Our criminal statutes have become more and more a nest of prohibitions, with penalties for their nonobservance. The average citizen is almost in the condition of a blind man trying to make his way in a field full of snares and pitfalls. It requires all the diligence and caution of the most intelligent man to escape day after day the infringement of some one or more of the many penalties with which the modern statutes of the United States fairly bristle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Colorado pardon a suggestion from the Chair. The Chair would invite attention to the provisions of section 29, which impose a heavier penalty for a second offense and for a third offense, combined fine and imprisonment, in accordance with the principles suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. We have the same provision in the State of Kansas, in addition to having the fine and imprisonment. If I may, while I am on my feet, refer to the situation in Kansas, because of conditions existing in our State, we applied the law to the bootleggers, and we were able to drive them out of business because of the extreme penalty. You can not drive bootleggers out of business simply by a fine.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether that law still exists in Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly it does.

Mr. THOMAS. Then this is cumulative. The Senator has his own State law and can proceed under it.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply suggest this because my experience as a prosecutor led me to believe that it would help the United States district attorney to enforce the law.

Mr. THOMAS. I know that the Senator very successfully administered the office of district attorney in Kansas and made one of the best records ever made by an officer in that capacity anywhere, and naturally I defer to the experience of such a man. I am, nevertheless, unwilling by my vote to accept the amendment which he offers, because I am convinced if the law can be enforced at all, it can be enforced under those circumstances, especially when you consider that the local statutes of the State are amply sufficient for the purpose of making the law effective, if it can be made effective at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado if there does not occur to him another reason than that which he has given. The Senator knows as a practicing lawyer the influence of a most drastic sentence upon jurors. He understands full well that if you make the penalty so great that the average juror would consider it an act of injustice, they will not convict, and you will secure more convictions and secure a better obedience of the law if the judgment that is pronounced may be in conformity with what the judge himself considers to be just or what a jury may consider to be sufficient to meet the demands of justice. When you go beyond that the tendency is to utilize almost any kind of an excuse to acquit.

Mr. THOMAS. That consideration had not occurred to me, but it is a very cogent one. It is well illustrated by the operation of the old common-law criminal code of Great Britain, which visited capital punishment upon any subject who was convicted of a larceny of goods of value in excess of 20 shillings. Of course, such a penalty for such an offense was considered monstrous even in those days, and it became ineffective precisely through the operation of the practice to which the Senator calls my attention. No matter what the value of the goods which were the subject of the indictment, it was very rarely that a jury would bring in a verdict of conviction and place the value at more than 20 shillings. In other words, they neutralized the severe penalty of the statute by utilizing their discretion, sometimes at the expense perhaps of their oaths, to so fix the value of the property as to bring upon the prisoner the milder rather than the harsher penalty. There is much in it. It is one of the saving graces of Anglo-Saxon institutions under the system of trial by jury that if legislation goes too far the juries will themselves furnish a corrective by refusing to apply the law in all its harshness in a given case, even to the extent of an acquittal if necessary.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to continue the debate, but I had no trouble in getting juries to convict with severe penalties. In fact, we had 17 men in jail one week and the jail would not hold any more, though we had 17 more convicted and awaiting sentence. The jury convicted just as fast as we brought them in and established that the men were guilty. I do not think the question of penalty where it is only 30 days would have any effect on the jury whatever. However, as I said, I have no desire to prolong the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment that has in one way to do with the enforcement of the law which the proposed bill covers, for it will, I think, round out the prohibition legislation that we have enacted for the territory of the United States and property under its jurisdiction. I offer as an amendment a bill which was reported, and which passed the Senate unanimously at the last session, and which has been again reported and is now on the calendar at this session. I take it that the Senator in charge of the bill will have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section to read as follows:

SEC. —. That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the Canal Zone, or to manufacture, sell, give away, dispose of, transport, or have in one's possession or under one's control within the Canal Zone, any alcoholic, fermented, brewed, distilled, vinous, malt, or spirituous liquors, except for sacramental, scientific, pharmaceutical, industrial, or medicinal purposes, under regulations to be made by the President, and any such liquors within the Canal Zone in violation hereof shall be forfeited to the United States and seized: Provided, That this section shall not apply to transportation of liquors to points without the Canal Zone by common carriers or by vessels on ocean voyages.

That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, company, or corporation, its officers, employees, or agents, to import or introduce into, transport through or into, sell, manufacture, dispose of, give away, or have in his or its possession or under his or its control within the Canal Zone, except for scientific, pharmaceutical, or medicinal purposes, any opium or cocaine, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium or cocaine, or any other habit-forming drug: Provided, That this section shall not apply to transportation of cocaine to points without the Canal Zone by common carriers or by vessels on ocean voyages.

That it shall be unlawful, within the Canal Zone, to engage in prostitution or to aid or abet prostitution or to procure or solicit for purposes of prostitution, or to keep or set up a house of ill fame, brothel, or bawdy house, or to receive any person for purposes of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution into any vehicle, conveyance, place, structure, or building, or to permit any person to remain for purposes of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution in any vehicle, conveyance, place, structure, or building; and it shall be unlawful for any person who has been, is, or may hereafter be practicing prostitution or pandering, or who has been, is, or may hereafter be registered or licensed as a prostitute at any place without the Canal Zone, to enter into or remain within the Canal Zone.

That each and every violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $1,000, and by imprisonment for not less than 30 days nor more than one year.

That all offenses heretofore committed within the Canal Zone may be prosecuted and all penalties therefor enforced in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment that is offered now, and I have heard it read for the first time. There is very much of merit in it, and I have no doubt that it is a proper measure to enact, but it covers not only the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, and use of intoxicating liquors in the Canal Zone, but questions of prostitution are involved. I am willing that the amendment shall be adopted and have it go to conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be done, although, as I said awhile ago, it has been drawn carefully and considered by committees twice. I think the Senator will find it in very good shape, but I am perfectly willing to let it go to conference in the hope that it may be considered there.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would have no objection to the amendment going to conference, but I really would like to have the opinion of the Senator upon our right to prevent the importation into the Canal Zone, into the city of Panama, intoxicating liquors or anything else that those people may see fit to use. While we assume almost undisputed sovereignty over that strip of territory 10 miles in width, our sovereignty is not entirely complete. It must be remembered that Panama in the grant reserved her sovereign power. She gave us control.

I considered it, and I came to the conclusion after reading the treaty some time ago that there could be no question about it, and that we would have no right to provide that any articles should go into the Canal Zone free if the Panaman Government imposed an import tax upon them. Our treaty did provide and the grant provided that we might import free of charge articles necessary for the construction of the canal and for our men employed in the building of the canal, but my own conviction is that we have no right under the grant to say to the Panaman Government, "We can shut off your supply of money to be raised through importation by a mere declaration that certain articles upon which you have levied a tax for importation shall not be imported into the Canal Zone." I think the Senator will find if he will investigate it carefully that there is a serious question as to whether we can control importation into the Canal Zone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have not read the treaty lately. I supposed there was no question as to our authority to regulate the Canal Zone itself for sanitation, moral purposes, prevention of crime, and to do in fact anything that we deemed necessary for the welfare of the zone. I shall be very much surprised if there is any serious doubt as to our authority to do that. When the matter of coal for the Canal Zone was before the Senate I looked into the matter pretty thoroughly, and I came to the conclusion that we had full sovereignty over the Canal Zone. My recollection is that the treaty expressly states that.

However, I do not care to argue the question here. I feel satisfied the Senator in charge of the bill and the other conferees will take that phase of the matter into very careful consideration. If they come to the conclusion that we have no authority to do this, of course it should not be done. If we have not the authority to do it, that is one thing we ought to get the authority to do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator some time look up the question and read the treaty over again. I would then like to have his own judgment upon the proposition whether we ourselves could force into the Canal Zone free of charge any American commodity, provided the Panaman Government passed a general law that all importations should bear a certain tax.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Even if that were true, it would not necessarily follow that we have no right to prohibit intoxicating liquors being sold on the Canal Zone, because that would rest upon an entirely different basis from the matter of levying import duties.

Mr. STERLING. I think I may say that I am in sympathy with the purpose the Senator from Washington seeks to accomplish by his proposed amendment, and I can assure him that the matter will have the careful consideration of the conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to what I believe ought to be an amendment to his suggested amendment. I have no objection, of course, to the proposed amendment; I am in entire sympathy with it and I think it ought to be added to the bill; but on page 2 of the proposed amendment, in line 23, I move to strike out the words "has been," and to strike out the same words in line 24. It has reference to prostitutes coming into the Canal Zone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator to my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator would accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will consider that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington is amended as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the amendment ought properly to appear immediately before the last section of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on page 50 of the bill I move an amendment. After the word "title," in line 8 on that page, to strike out all down to and including the word "thereunder," in line 9. The words I move to strike out are as follows: "or of regulations lawfully made thereunder." If this amendment prevails, I shall move to strike out similar words in lines 5 and 6. It is in the penalty clause of Title III.

It now reads:

SEC. 15. Whoever operates an industrial alcohol plant or a denaturing plant without complying with the provisions of this title and lawful regulations made thereunder, or whoever withdraws or attempts to withdraw or secure tax free any alcohol subject to tax, or whoever otherwise violates any of the provisions of this title or of regulations lawfully made thereunder shall be liable,

My idea is that we ought not to provide a penalty, particularly the same severe penalty, for the violation of a regulation made by the commissioner as we do for the violation of the law itself. There are a thousand ways, it seems to me, in which the commissioner, if he saw fit, might resort to various petty regulations that would be exasperating and unfair. Besides, it is in reality delegating to him the right to legislate and providing a penalty for a violation of his regulations. The commissioner might, for instance, make a regulation that a certain plant should be kept locked with a Yale lock, and if the owner of it kept it locked with some other lock just as good as a Yale lock he would be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000 and also to imprisonment for not exceeding 30 days, and for a second violation of any regulation he would be liable to a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $10,000 and to imprisonment for not less than 30 days nor more than 1 year. I think it has always been the policy of Congress not to provide criminal punishment for the violation of regulations that are to be made by officials under the law. I believe, therefore, that this language ought to be stricken out of the bill, so that the punishment provided for in this section will apply only to violations of the law and not to violations of regulations made by the commissioner.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. Does the Senator think that Congress has the power to delegate to any commissioner the authority to make criminal laws and to create criminal offenses in this country?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably we have not; but even if we had, it is something that Congress ought not to do. As I remember, it has been the policy of Congress not to do those things.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree with the Senator, and I doubt the power of Congress to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, there is an amendment pending to this bill which has been proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill, but I desire to offer some observations upon a matter not wholly connected with the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Let us first pass the bill.

Mr. STERLING. I think, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me to say so, that we shall very soon dispose of the bill if the Senator will withhold his remarks for a little while.

Mr. BORAH. If there is going to be no further debate on the bill, of course I do not want to interfere with its passage; but if there is going to be discussion I prefer to go ahead now.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there will be any extended discussion, but I want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Nebraska; that is all. Other Senators may desire to speak upon the amendment. I can not say as to that, but my supposition is that there can not be very much further discussion.

Mr. BORAH. There are other Senators who propose to speak upon the matter, so they have informed me.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

AMERICAN SOLDIERS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we are to bring the American soldiers out of Russia before winter shall forbid their coming it is necessary that prompt action be had. The situation is such that unless action is taken at once it will be impossible to bring them out of that region of country before next midsummer. It is opportune, therefore, to again call attention to our position relative to Russia, our attitude toward that country, and the presence of our soldiers among those people.

I presume we have all reflected upon the Russian problem a great deal. I do not desire to be understood as speaking from impulse or without reflection; and yet, Mr. President, I frankly admit that the remarks which I am about to submit to-day are brought on at this particular time, in part at least, by reason of a letter which came to me within the last two days, written by an American soldier in Russia to his mother and sent by her to me. I do not feel that it would be proper to insert the letter in the RECORD, for there are some statements in it which undoubtedly the writer did not intend for anyone except his mother to see, but there are some features of it which it is not improper for me to state.

The substance of the letter was that the soldiers in Russia could not understand why they were there. They were conscripted for the purpose of fighting the war with Germany, but they had been sent by authority of their Government to Russia. As he expressed himself, he was perfectly willing and his comrades were perfectly willing to endure any hardships or to make any sacrifice necessary to the defense of their country against an enemy, but so far they had been wholly unable to ascertain why they were in Russia, enduring extreme hardships and engaging in battle, when they had no object, so far as they could understand, to attain, and no purpose, so far as the welfare of their country was concerned, to serve. He went on to say that that which was demoralizing the soldiers in Russia was not the fact that they were there enduring these hardships, but the fact that they were there without any knowledge upon their part as to the reason why they should be engaged in such a service. He closed his letter by saying that any number of the soldiers there had been reduced to that desperation and despair which are akin to insanity. It was altogether a manly but most pathetic message, stating in language simple and direct this problem which bewilders the whole American people—why are our young men suffering and fighting and dying in Russia?

Mr. President, we are not at war with Russia: Congress has not declared war against the Russian Government or the Russian people. The people of the United States do not desire to be at war with Russia. If the question were submitted to the people of this country, there would be a practically unanimous voice against war with Russia or any part or faction or division of the Russian people. Yet, while we are not at war with Russia, while Congress has not declared war, we are carrying on war with the Russian people. We have an army in Russia; we are furnishing munitions and supplies to other armed forces in that country, and we are just as thoroughly engaged in conflict as though constitutional authority had been evoked, a declaration of war had been had, and the Nation had been called to arms for that purpose.

A few days ago a delegation of citizens waited on Members of Congress and the President, asking for a statement from their Government as to why we were in Russia, what objects we hoped to achieve, and what our plans and purposes were with reference to our intervention in Russia. They went back, so far as the public press reports indicate, without any information upon that subject; and to-day we are utterly at sea as to why our armed forces, in company with the armed forces of Japan and of Great Britain, are carrying on war in Russia. Whatever is being done in that country in the way of armed intervention is without constitutional authority. In other words, it is, to speak frankly and plainly, a plain usurpation of power to maintain troops in Russia at this time. There is neither legal nor moral justification for sacrificing these lives. It is in violation of the plain principles of free government. It is lawlessness.

The able Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] discussed this morning what he conceived to be, and what many may agree with him to be, an ominous situation by reason of the conflict between organized labor in the District of Columbia and the authority of the Government; but we can not hope to imbue the American people with a proper regard for authority or for our Government if those in high places utterly disregard the plainest principles of orderly constitutional government. If the time has actually come when we can conscript American youth for the purpose of carrying on war against a declared enemy and utilize him in the internal concerns and internal affairs of a country with which we are not at war, you need not talk to the people of respect for law and order. Such action breaks down and disregards every fundamental principle of a people's government. It is in utter disregard not only of fundamental constitutional principles, but it is in utter disregard of the first rights of the citizens; and there could be no plainer usurpation of power than utilizing men conscripted for the purpose of carrying on the war with Germany to take care of internal conditions in Russia. It is contempt of the dearest rights to which the people have heretofore laid claim and which they have heretofore believed to be securely assured to them under their Government. Let those who are pleading for law and respect for law in these turbulent days set an example.

It has been said, Mr. President, that the difficulty with reference to the Russian situation is that we have had no policy with reference to Russia, and therefore we have been moving without any concerted purpose or without any ultimate aim. I wholly disagree with that proposition. There has been for many months a policy with reference to Russia. The criticism to be lodged against those who are responsible for it is that it has not been made known to the American people. I venture to say that at no distant day there will appear to the American people the fact that for the last six months there has been with reference to Russia a settled, determined, and well-understood policy. It is a policy which, in my judgment, originated with Japan and Great Britain, and the United States as a co-ally or associated power has been willing to help effectuate. We have been dragged in as we have in other miserable affairs, and as we are going to be dragged in other affairs if the present program goes through.

There is no possible reason why Japan should have from 80,000 to 100,000 soldiers in Russia except to effectuate her policy with reference to Siberia, and there is no possible reason why Great Britain should have kept her troops in Russia except to assist Japan in effectuating her policy with reference to Siberia. The United States is permitting American soldiers to be utilized to assist in effectuating a policy in which Japan is primarily concerned with reference to that region of country. Our boys are being sacrificed to satisfy the sinister ambition of other powers.

This policy, Mr. President, has been halted, it is true, but it has been halted by reason of popular sentiment and not by reason of any uncertainty of purpose on the part of those who originated the policy. The reason why more troops have not been sent to Russia by Great Britain and by the United States is because of the fact that public sentiment has been against the proposal. A few days ago when Great Britain undertook to send more troops to Russia it will be recalled that there was a mutiny upon the part of the English troops. That immediately put Great Britain on notice that not only the troops but public sentiment in England was against the proposition. What possible reason could there be for sending more troops into Russia from Great Britain when Japan had 80,000 troops there already, and the only assigned reason was to protect a piece of railroad? The reason this policy has not been carried out more effectually has not been due, therefore, to any uncertainty of purpose, but to the fact that public sentiment had not yet been sufficiently trained or molded to support the program.

A few days ago Winston Churchill spoke upon the Russian question. He is a member of the English Government and the head of one of its departments. The purport of his speech was, first, that the condition in Russia warranted the military intervention of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, and that that which was being done in Russia was by reason of a well-understood policy between these countries that there should be military intervention in Russia. In this address Mr. Churchill says, defending his position in regard to sending troops into Russia:

> I am executing as a departmental minister, to the best of my ability, the policy which I have received from the war cabinet; and the war cabinet themselves have adopted that policy only in conformity with the United States, with France, with Italy, and with Japan. It is not a personal policy. It is an international, it is an interallied, policy.

Adopted, as he says, in pursuance of an understanding between the United States, Great Britain, and Japan.

And what is the policy which has been adopted by these three countries, according to the construction of the war minister of Great Britain? It is a policy to intervene by military force in the internal affairs of Russia and to establish there, by military power, a government which will be satisfactory to these three powers and aid in the imperialistic plans of Japan. That is the policy which has been in existence for some time. When we discuss it in this country we refer to it as a policy merely to protect a piece of railroad. When Churchill speaks of it he defines it in his speech as being a policy based upon military intervention to put down a certain force in Russia and establish a government satisfactory to the allied powers. It is plainly a policy of military intervention, first to establish a government such as we think a proper government for those people, and secondly to bring about a situation where Japan will secure further interests in Siberia. This is the plan in all its concealed but hideous truth, and every boy who dies in Russia is a sacrifice to the unlawful and intolerable scheme.

The President said in his speech last night that heretofore the United States was compelled to attend to its own business, but that now it was in a position to attend to everybody's business; and that, Mr. President, is precisely what we are doing. Without any declaration of war, without any just principle back of us, without any reason for war, we are sending our troops into Russia, there to endure the inclemency of an intolerable winter, suffer, and die for the purpose of establishing a government out of the internal situation of Russia and satiating the imperialistic maw of a despotic power.

Mr. Churchill says:

> The uplift of Russia from her present situation will be the first duty of the league of nations, and it is a vital interest of the allied powers.

"The uplift of Russia," according to his idea, is to send sufficient Japanese and British and American troops into Russia to establish a government, and to set up a power for governmental purposes satisfactory to these three powers. Whether it conforms to the desires of the Russian people or not, whether it conforms to the wishes of those upon whom will rest the responsibility of maintaining that government in the future, if we are to assume that Russia is to be a self-governing nation, we are to send sufficient troops there, when the league of nations is adopted, to establish a form of government; and, necessarily, after it is established we are to send sufficient troops there to maintain it. Instead of having from eight to ten thousand American soldiers in Russia, if that is the policy which is to be carried out, before another year has passed we will be called upon to supply 100,000 or 200,000 troops for Russia. I venture to say that if the policy of Mr. Churchill is carried out, there will be more than 500,000 troops in Russia before the task shall have been completed.

Further on he says:

> The league of nations is on its trial in regard to Russia. If the league of nations can not save Russia, Russia in her agony will destroy the league of nations.

That is not original with Mr. Churchill. That is precisely the principle and the policy announced by Metternich in 1822 with reference to the Holy Alliance. When Metternich declared that it was necessary for the Holy Alliance to take part in the internal affairs of South America, of Spain, and of other countries, he based it upon the proposition that unless democracy was put down in those countries democracy would inevitably destroy the governments which were the pillars of the Holy Alliance. Sir, before the league of nations shall have been ratified or adopted by the people of the United States or by any of the allied powers, we are informed by no less an authority than the secretary for war of Great Britain that the first task of the league of nations will be to take part in the internal affairs of a great nation for the sole and exclusive reason, as assigned by him, that the internal condition of that country is such as to require our action, lest it spread over international lines and affect the nations which are directly interested in the league.

I invite the attention of those who have been contending here upon the floor of the Senate that there was no such authority under the clauses of the league to a consideration of the entire speech of Mr. Churchill. No power is attacking the territorial integrity of Russia. There is no external aggression with reference to Russia. Russia has not assailed any of the members, or proposed members, of the league. There is an internal condition in Russia, exclusively an internal condition, and yet a member of the British Government already construes the league to authorize—and he justifies it in an extended speech—interference in the purely internal concerns of that country. You may say, Mr. President, that that is not our construction, but we are nevertheless following the construction placed upon it by our allies, and we are furnishing the soldiers to carry out the program based upon this construction. We are in Russia at this time at the command of Japan and Great Britain, and every American soldier who loses his life in Russia between now and the time when they shall finally come out will be the victim of the policy established by those two powers with reference to their interests in Siberia.

What possible interest has the United States in that contest? What reason have we to call the boys from the American farms and factories and send them into that region of country to suffer and die? What possible purpose does it serve, so far as we are concerned, to interfere there and keep those young men away from their homes and from their families, under such conditions that they say to their mothers and fathers, "We have been reduced to that point of despair which is akin to insanity"?

I repeat with deliberation and without hesitation that it is usurpation of power. There is no authority in the Constitution, no authority vested in the Chief Executive, to keep a soldier in Russia a single hour; and while the President is upon his trip out through the country, I wish he might state to the American people by what authority these American boys are now fighting in Russia. Let us know the policy in its fullness. Let those upon whom the sacrifice is to fall understand to what extent it is proposed to go in this business of military intervention.

Mr. President, this perhaps explains something about the vast military organizations which are being built up in this country, in Japan, and in Great Britain. The war is over. Germany is reduced to helplessness. No nation with which we have been at war is in a position to inflict injury upon the United States or any of the allies of the war. We are on the verge, we are told, of an era of peace; and yet such armaments, such military preparations, the world has never seen as are now going on in all the countries which are to be members of the "league of peace."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know what number of American soldiers are now in Russia?

Mr. BORAH. From 8,000 to 10,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know where they are? Can he give us that information?

Mr. BORAH. I can not tell the Senator in detail where they are. I have some information here upon my desk, news dispatches. That is all I know.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a letter from a soldier in Siberia now, part of which I want to read in connection with the Senator's remarks when he has concluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. As to numbers, in answer to the query of the Senator from Georgia, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will state that we have 8,000 effectives in Siberia. We have 10,000 United States troops there altogether. We have, unless recently withdrawn, some hundreds of United States engineers in northern Russia building roads and engaged on various matters of construction for the British, under British command.

Mr. BORAH. The whole thing, Mr. President, is under British command. We are there under British command. We are there under the authority of Great Britain and Japan. We would not have a single soldier in Russia upon the volition of the United States itself.

I say, Mr. President, that we are engaged—these powers that are soon to be members of the league—in building up by far the largest military force, the greatest armament, that the world has ever known. We have before us a bill providing for a Regular Army of 500,000 men. That is about four times the size of the army that we felt it necessary to maintain prior to the time when we were about to adopt the league of nations. Then, Mr. President, a most extraordinary thing has taken place. The President and Mr. Baker have stood out against universal military training through these years, during all the time when the exigency was on; and now, about the time when the last soldier is ever to visit Europe, according to the President, they have yielded to the proposition of universal military training, indorsed it; and there is now pending before the Senate a bill which takes the first step in that direction. In addition to that, as I say, we are to have a Regular Army of 500,000 men, and an establishment which will provide for reserves to the number of about 600,000. We are also providing for the largest navy in the world, with the possible exception of Great Britain. Japan and Great Britain are carrying forward the same program with reference to military preparedness.

This can not be for the purpose of taking care of Germany. This can not be for the purpose of taking care of Austria-Hungary or of Turkey. It is for the purpose of carrying out this other program of reducing to serfdom and holding there nearly 900,000,000 people who will be subject people when this league of nations is adopted. It is for the purpose of taking care of the 13,000,000 in Egypt now in open rebellion, for the purpose of taking care of the countless millions in India, for the purpose of taking care of the Balkans, for the purpose of taking care of Ireland, for the purpose of taking care of Korea; for when this league of nations is organized the five principal powers will represent in population about 300,000,000 people, while the subject peoples over whom the league will have control will represent about 900,000,000 people.

I read in yesterday's New York Tribune the following:

The British Government has suggested that the United States send 200,000 troops as quickly as possible to Armenia.

The British Government has suggested that the United States send 200,000 troops to Armenia!

The British Government has suggested that the United States send 200,000 troops as quickly as possible to Armenia. The State Department has received a report of this suggestion from the naval officer who is the representative of this country on the international commission which has been meeting at Constantinople for discussion of near eastern affairs in connection with the peace treaty and the taking up of the various mandataries in that part of the world.

It was learned further to-day that the American representative on this commission had nearly a month ago proposed 50,000 as the number of American troops to be sent to Armenia. This number, however, was scouted by the British representatives on the commission as utterly inadequate and the figure set at 200,000.

Two hundred thousand is the number which is to be sent, at the request of Great Britain, to Armenia.

Now, Mr. President, if we are to engage in the final execution of the program announced by Mr. Churchill, to wit, that these powers have agreed upon military intervention in Russia for the purpose of setting up a government satisfactory to the Allies; if we are to furnish our portion of the troops for that task; if we are to furnish our portion of the troops for Armenia; if we are to furnish our portion of the troops to take care of these different situations already apparent and which have been recorded with the Secretary of State as requiring our attention, indeed the army of 500,000 men is not too large.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the course of the Senator's remarks, while he is commenting on the size of the Military Establishment and upon the raising of an army, and the request of an army of 50,000 men to go to Armenia, and also commenting upon the fact that part of the purpose in raising this army is to subjugate Russia, I should like to call his attention to the fact that a few weeks ago our military department started their recruiting offices to recruit soldiers especially for service in Russia and in China, that being the condition of the enlistment. I have never seen an enlistment paper, but an enlisting officer informed me that that is the fact, and I have heard the statement otherwise, and have never heard it denied. I have no doubt it is true. If that is true, it appears that the first fruit of this league of peace is that we are now enlisting men for service in countries that, so far as any legal action is concerned, are at peace with the United States. I ask the Senator if he knows anything about that enlistment?

Mr. BORAH. I only know what has been reported. I have not seen any facts in regard to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I might throw a little light on that matter.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have here a report dated August 16, 1919, which sets forth in tabulated form the history of the recruiting done for the Army since February 28 last.

The men as they reported for enlistment in the service or offered themselves for enlistment were given an opportunity to express a preference as to where they would like to serve. Twenty-three per cent of the total number, and the number at that time was about 100,000 recruits, expressed a preference. Of these, 12,754 expressed a preference to be sent to Europe, 2,977 to the Philippines, 2,364 to the Mexican border, 2,034 to Hawaii, 1,034 to Siberia, 315 to Panama, and, quite naturally, 193 to Alaska.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator reading from an official statement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; as to the preferences expressed by the men who presented themselves for enlistment.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, inform us whether these men in their contract of enlistment are required to serve in the particular country designated?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are required to serve anywhere they are sent.

Mr. REED. But is it not a fact that the men enlist upon a specific condition that they will serve in Russia, in China, and in other foreign parts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are asked their preference in order that the War Department may send to Russia or Siberia, for instance, the men who have expressed a willingness to go there; but of course the number who have expressed a willingness to go to Siberia, to wit, 1,034, are not nearly enough to replace the 8,400 troops we now have in Siberia. So other men who did not express that preference must be sent to Siberia if those troops are to be replaced.

Mr. REED. That is a little aside from the point I am making. I am asking the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he knows—and if he does not know, I hope, as chairman of that committee, he will ascertain—whether it is not a fact that in the contract of enlistment or in the preliminary papers which bear upon it, men are required to consent specifically to this service in foreign parts. To repeat—and I am sorry I have made this interruption if I am wearying the Senator from Idaho—a recruiting officer, a colonel, stated to me specifically that men are being enlisted for service in Russia and service in China, and my recollection is he said in other foreign parts. If that is true, it is a pretty clear indication that the War Department, acting under somebody's order and direction, is already getting ready for the sending of American boys abroad to carry out the purposes of this council or league or combination or conspiracy—by whatsoever name you can call it—which is running the business of the world, including the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to reply to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Missouri alludes to what he terms "preliminary papers," in addition to the contract of enlistment itself. It may be true, and probably is true, that recruiting officers in discussing the prospects of Army service with prospective soldiers tell them that they may be ordered to China or to Siberia under the contract of enlistment, and sound them upon the question as to whether, in view of that possibility, they care to enlist. But no matter what the preliminary conversations are, no matter what the preliminary understandings are, the only thing that is binding is the contract of enlistment, and under the contract of enlistment, when they are once in the Army, they can be sent anywhere.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would not seem that the department has been very successful thus far in securing an expression of preference from these men for going to Siberia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is no doubt familiar with the statement made by the Secretary of War as to the progress being made in returning drafted men from Siberia and securing the enlistment of volunteers willing to go there.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is familiar with the figures given?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One remark was made which indicated that nothing has been done toward returning the drafted men, and that they are going to be kept there during the rigors of the coming winter.

Mr. BORAH. It is utterly physically impossible under the program which the Secretary of War has outlined to get a single conscripted soldier out of Russia before next midsummer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to read a communication in that connection?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to having the communication read, but I have seen very many of these communications. In fact, for the last nine months these statements have been coming in as to what they were going to do with reference to bringing the soldiers out of Russia, but they have not brought the soldiers out of Russia, and there is no program which in its practical workings will bring them out of Russia before next midsummer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that I made specific inquiry some time ago of the Secretary of War, and if the Senator has no objection and will let me read a brief communication at this time, it will throw some light on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. I would prefer to have it come at the end of my remarks, but if the Senator prefers he may read it now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is very brief.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is from Secretary Baker and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 23, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: I have been able to inquire somewhat closely into the condition of our forces in Siberia. The total enlisted personnel there is 8,153 men, of whom not to exceed 6,500 men are under an emergency enlistment. Since recruiting was resumed for the Regular Army the War Department has permitted recruits to elect whether or not they desire to be sent to Siberia, and 3,411 men have so elected. Of these something over 2,000 have been sent to Vladivostok and the residue will be available for shipment about the 15th of September. In the meantime, we are receiving daily recruits at a rate ranging from 50 to 60 men, so that each month brings us about 1,500 recruits preferring Siberian service. A very few months, therefore, will suffice to relieve all of the emergency men in the expeditionary force in Siberia.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the date of the letter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. August 23.

Mr. BORAH. The letter is in perfect harmony with the program in reference to Russia for the last year. Under that program it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that these young men who were conscripted to fight a war with Germany must remain in Russia for another year practically. For at least six or nine months they can not get them out of there as a physical proposition. It is impossible to get men there and get them out under conditions which will soon arrive with reference to weather until midsummer again. We were assured, in response to the resolution of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] months ago, that that which is now promised would have been consummated before this time. But all that is beside the question, Why are American soldiers there at all? Suppose Regulars are sent to take the place of conscripted, what is the policy that takes us there at all?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. This debate seems to be centering around whether the men who are in Russia were drafted and whether they can get men to be sent to take their places. That may be a matter that is personal to the soldier, and, of course, his rights are to be considered, but back of that is the much greater question whether anybody has any authority or any right to send a man to Russia even if the man is willing to go, whether the taxpayer of the United States has not some rights, whether the Government of the United States as a government has not some right to say whether our soldiers shall be serving in that distant clime.

Mr. BORAH. That is the real question which I desire to discuss, and the only question I have been discussing is what right have we to send soldiers into Russia, whether they are volunteers or conscripted or of the Regular Army? The question is, What are we doing in Russia? What authority have we for being there? There is no condition in Russia except an internal one. There is no external attack upon Russia, even if we would presuppose the league of nations in advance of its ratification. It is purely an internal affair, and yet Mr. Churchill says that though it is an internal affair it is one of the things, the first thing, which the league of nations will be called upon to adjust.

Tell me how under the league of nations you can go into Russia at all, except under article 11? The contention which we have been making here, and which Mr. Churchill by his program substantiates, is that any war or threat of war, whether internal or external, is within the jurisdiction of the league under article 11.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad that the Senator from Idaho has called the attention of the Senate to this condition, and he has asked a question which I feel impelled to answer from my standpoint. He wants to know what purpose can be subserved by our intrusion into the affairs of Russia. I freely concede that as matters have been managed we have subserved and can subserve no great purpose outside of the protection given to a line of railroad. The policy of sending a few troops, and that policy was an allied one, is wholly inadequate for any purpose except possibly that of keeping guard over supplies at Archangel and Vladivostok, and that is ended.

Mr. BORAH. That is a proposition which has long since disappeared.

Mr. THOMAS. That was one of the purposes, perhaps the main purpose, of the original expedition. I have always felt that after the fall of the Kerensky government and the conclusion of the treaty of peace at Brest-Litovsk, the Allies owed a duty to themselves and to those people in Russia who were not affiliated with the then so-called government, and above all to the magnificent efforts of the Czecho-Slovaks who crossed that country and reached the French frontier, to have interfered in a most substantial way, to have thrown an allied army into Russia and upon the Russian front, to have stood by the people of Russia, who have always been with the Allies, and without whose assistance and cooperation during the earlier months of the war Germany would have inevitably triumphed. We did not do that. Consequently I can see no reason now for keeping troops there unless some belated policy of that sort has been agreed upon, and I reserve my judgment as to the expediency of it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Colorado has stated the policy which obtained with reference to this proposition. Mr. Churchill stated the other day in his speech in England the policy just as the Senator from Colorado states it, and that is that we are going into Russia to intervene with military power to adjust the internal affairs of Russia in accordance with what we think to be right.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator is mistaken. I referred to the time when we were at war with the Central Powers. I referred to a condition which meant a very serious menace to the cause of the Allies.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that time is past.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that time is past.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I said if such a policy could now be formulated, I should reserve my judgment as to its expediency. I do not think any such policy is likely even to be considered, much less adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Such a policy, I will say to the Senator, is being considered.

Mr. THOMAS. In the United States?

Mr. BORAH. In the United States, and such a policy is now being carried out by the United States. For what possible reason can we be recruiting soldiers to send into Russia to take the place of the volunteers except upon the theory that we have some policy of interfering in Russian affairs? This theory put forth that 100,000 Japanese, 10,000 Americans, and thousands of British troops are there to guard a railroad is not satisfactory. Besides the battles going on are not about or over railroads. Churchill states the object of our being there and states plainly that it is in accord with a policy agreed upon between the United States, Great Britain, and Japan.

Mr. THOMAS. There may be other theories. I do not pretend to know what the administration's purposes are with regard to that subject. I am satisfied that if the inquiry is made by the Senate the information will be furnished. That is my impression.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me it ought to be said that nobody else knows, of course, what the policy of the administration is, though there might be some weak-minded people who believe that Congress, representing the people, ought to have some knowledge about what is the policy of the administration. But of course that is erroneous. Congress has not any right to know what is the policy of the administration.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator's very satirical remark was not provoked by anything I said. I agree with him that Congress should be kept informed as to such matters at all times. Indeed, it should be the standing rule of all administrations whenever its policy is such as to provoke or assume a necessity for the use of either the military or naval forces of the United States, or both.

Mr. BORAH. It is immaterial so far as the main question is concerned whether the soldier who is sent to Russia be a volunteer, regularly enlisted, or whether he be a conscripted soldier. The question is why we should be in Russia at all.

I think it a most extraordinary situation, one that could hardly be conceived would ever happen in this country, that we have troops in Russia, a country with which we are at peace, and that conflict and battle are actually being waged, in which American troops are being shot down and in which American soldiers are shooting Russians. That is the situation which exists at this time; and it is against that, Mr. President, that I desire to protest.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I sympathize with the Senator in the idea that our troops ought to be out of Russia; that we ought not to send volunteers there; but I think it is worth while to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that we are still technically at war with Germany and Austria; that the war conditions are affected by the Siberian situation; and that since our foreign affairs are in charge exclusively of the Executive it will account for what is taking place there. I think really that the Constitution ought to be changed, so that since we are now unavoidably in contact with the world the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate should function as a body of advisers that will really have something to say and something to do with regard to our foreign affairs besides merely acting upon the ratification of a treaty when it comes in here at the last minute. I think the American people ought to have representation in the legislative branch in dealing with foreign questions; but our structure of Government has not adequately provided for it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course the war with Germany is over.

Mr. OWEN. Not yet.

Mr. BORAH. Although the treaty has not been signed upon our part, the war, the conflict with Germany, is over. Germany is helpless; there is no conflict going on; there is no fight with the enemy; but we are fighting a nation that was our ally; we are fighting a nation which furnished troops and tremendous aid in the conflict. We are not contending at this time against any nation which was engaged in the war upon the other side, but we are now contending against a nation and are engaged in conflict with a nation which furnished millions of soldiers in the conflict on our side; and we are doing it not by reason of any situation which arose out of the war but by reason of the fact that there is an organization or pseudo government in Russia which we do not like and which we are now proposing by military intervention to put down. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think it only fair to say that while the Government of Russia as organized at the beginning of the war was with the Entente Allies, the recent government of Russia under Lenin and Trotski has been in sympathetic cooperation with the German forces, if, indeed, the German forces did not set that government up, and that therefore the government of Lenin and Trotski ought not to be compared to the government of Nicholas, which was on the side of the Entente Allies, as being the same identical thing. They are very different, and the people——

Mr. BORAH. I understand, but——

Mr. OWEN. Pardon me just a moment. The people of Russia are still a very different thing from either one of those governments.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and the people of Russia are suffering by reason of our presence there.

Mr. OWEN. I hope not.

Mr. BORAH. The reports that come into this country, except under the control of the censored press, very clearly show who it is that is suffering by reason of our action in Russia. For instance, a few days ago a shipload of medical supplies which were bought some time ago in Scandinavia by the Russian Government was seized by the British naval forces while on its way to Petrograd for the relief of the suffering masses. The women and children and common people of Russia are being starved by reason of the blockade which is being maintained by the allied Governments. There is not anything which has happened in this war more cruel and pitiless than the suffering which has taken place among the Russian people as a mass by reason of the unjust and cruel blockade which has been maintained by the allied Governments since the war was over. We are starving helpless babes because there are Bolshevists in Russia. We are starving worn-out and broken-down mothers because there are Bolshevists in Russia. We are as cruel as the Bolshevists and call it civilization. We are as brutal as the Bolshevists and call it Christianity.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator consider that more cruel than the widely extended and frequently continued massacres of large bodies of the Russian people by the so-called Bolshevik government?

Mr. BORAH. We are not responsible for that.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know whether we are or not. I think we are very largely so.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator takes the position which I thought a while ago he did take, that we should go in there and uproot and eliminate and destroy the Bolshevik government, he has at least a logical proposition, although I think a most unwise one.

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment. But we are responsible for the suffering of the men and women and children by reason of the blockade which we are now maintaining.

Mr. THOMAS. No; if the Senator will permit me, what I mean is that if the allied Governments during the war, immediately after the infamous and abominable treaty of Brest-Litovsk, had gone there in force, as they should have gone, the infamies, horrors, and bloodshed consequent upon the so-called Bolshevik government would not have disgraced the name of civilization.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is a thing that is in the past; I am discussing now a present situation. That is water that has gone under the bridge. What I want to know is why we are maintaining a blockade against the Russian people and causing suffering among the masses of the Russian people who have never been responsible for any of the hardships which have taken place in Russia, and a people who have always been friendly toward the United States? Why should we be cruel and inhuman toward any people anywhere under any form of government? Have we lost faith, utterly lost faith in the healing, conjuring power of humanity and justice? Must we resort to force and inhumanity in all affairs of life? I reject the hideous and hellish creed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Just this moment the Senator from Idaho has used the expression "the Russian people" and a few moments ago he spoke of our fighting "the Russian Government." Does he mean by "the Russian Government" Lenin and Trotski and their followers?

Mr. BORAH. What I said was that Mr. Churchill and those who were in favor of military intervention were in favor of it for the reason that some form of government had been set up there with which they were out of harmony, and, therefore, they desired to uproot and destroy it. So far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of fighting any form of government which the Russian people see fit to set up. I am in favor of them settling their own difficulties and setting up any kind of a government which they want.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not care to enter into a colloquy, except to make this observation: If it is the Senator's opinion that Lenin and Trotski and their followers represent the Russian people, then I take issue with him. They are not the Russian people; they do not represent a Russian government. They represent for the time being a lot of murderers who are the common enemy of all mankind.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Of course, so far as their representing the people is concerned, that is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion. It is a peculiar thing to me, Mr. President, if Lenin and Trotski do not represent the great mass of the Russian people, why it is that Admiral Kolchak and others claiming to represent the Russian people can get no support from the Russian people themselves, but depend entirely for their support upon people from abroad. There are 180,000,000 people in Russia, and if the Lenin and Trotski government is not representative of the masses, and if they are not in sympathy with it and do not believe in it, they would overthrow it and submerge it within a fortnight.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Republic of China contains over 400,000,000 of people, and yet the Senator knows that they are subject to the domination of 60,000,000 people constituting the Empire of Japan. The reason of the inability of the Russian people to cope with the monster of Bolshevism, I think, is identical with that which explains the phenomenon of the power of Japan over China—the lack of organization, the impossibility of securing means of resistance, and the tremendous power that comes from a disciplined and dominant force which is subjugating and murdering them.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's analogy is not an apt one, for the simple reason that the only support which Lenin and Trotski have, the 300,000 men who are in their armies, come from their own people, while the only support which Kolchak and his associates seem to have is that which comes from the outside.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Idaho is too good a student of history not to know that the forces constituting the Red army are composed very largely of Chinese and other foreigners.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not know it.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and that they are officered by the flower of the German officers. They are to-day the potent force in the hands of Germany for the ultimate domination of Russia, and when that is accomplished——

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Just a second. When that is accomplished, and it will be accomplished if the civilized world sits still and permits it, Germany as a future menace will be far more terrible to the Allies and to the other countries of the world than she was from 1914 to 1918.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty with the Senator is that he, as it seems to me, is afraid of his own logic.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. When I said a moment ago that he was in perfect harmony with Mr. Churchill, who stated that we must go into Russia and destroy the forces of Russia which were now in control in order to protect ourselves against Germany, he refused to accept that attitude. Now his logic leads him to the position that, if we are going to protect ourselves against Russia, we must go in there and destroy the Russian forces which are inseparable from the Russian people.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is mistaken or else I have expressed myself very badly. I do not know that we would be able if we did interfere now to stem what seems to me to be the inevitable tide of events. I feel very strongly, however, that if a different course had been pursued, and pursued vigorously, the German menace would have been effectually extinguished by the armistice of last November. As it is now, I very much question whether the snake has been more than scotched by the terrible four years of war.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator in favor of keeping an army in Russia in sufficient force to effectuate anything?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not in favor of keeping an American army anywhere out of the boundaries of the United States, except where it is absolutely necessary for our protection and for our future.

Mr. BORAH. That is sound Americanism.

Mr. THOMAS. As to whether that is necessary now, as I have previously said, I must reserve my judgment; I do not know; but I do feel that the allied policy toward Russia was sadly inefficient during the time of the great crisis when we should have interfered if we interfered at all.

Mr. BORAH. I think I agree with the Senator in both propositions, and I do not need to reserve my judgment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr President, I interrupt to read from a letter from a soldier in the Siberian army. It bears upon the discussion which has been going on before the Senate. He says:

> It took us a very brief time to learn that the word "Bolshevik" was merely the name of the economic faith and of the political party of the mass of the people.

Describing a battle, he says:

> The American troops, at the command of an officer, fired at the houses, though many of the men had the sense to fire high. Luckily for our conscience and our repute, the old men, women, and children who remained had taken refuge in cellars.
> In all, there were 8 or 10 victims.
> In Kazanka, Lieut. Vejar fired on a huddled mass of unarmed men and women, and town's population, who had been herded together. One bullet hit a woman, who, falling to the ground, bloody and dying, gave birth to a stillborn child.

That is the duty which has been imposed upon American troops in Siberia.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, I admit that conditions in Russia are bad; that they are out of harmony with our theory of government and our theory of civilization; but when have they been otherwise? The accumulated horrors of the Czar reign in Russia are quite as bad, to my mind, as the accumulated horrors of the Bolshevik government. The Czar reign in Russia, from Ivan the Terrible down to this time, has been one continued unbroken story of cruelty, of oppression, and of repression of the masses of the people. No one can read the story of Russia for the last 300 years and find any great dissimilarity in the treatment of the masses between the old régime and the present one. When the real truth is known the cruelties of the present will not be more revolting than the cruelties of the vicious, corrupt, and heartless despots of the last 300 years. It is the saddest tale in all history.

The Russian people have been oppressed for decades, but the United States during the last 140 years never thought of interfering with the cruelties, persistent and continued, of the Czars. Those were matters which we have not undertaken to adjust, and never dreamed that it was our duty to adjust. I admit that the conditions in Russia by reason of the Bolshevik government are intolerable from our standpoint, but no more so from my standpoint than were the conditions under the Czars, and I protest against maintaining American soldiers in Russia for a single day after they can be brought out. There is no wise or sane policy of government which justifies their being there, and I again say, Mr. President, that I am opposed to maintaining the blockade against the Russian people for a single day after it can be successfully raised by order of the Government.

Reflect for a moment, Mr. President. After the war is over, after all conflicts are ended, after fighting with the enemy has ceased, we are maintaining a blockade against those people which is more cruel and more remorseless than many of the activities which we took up arms against Germany to end. There is no possible justification for a Christian people not permitting the Russian people to be fed, the same as other human beings. I wish to say that if it were not for Japan and Great Britain, in my judgment the President of the United States would never have sent a single soldier to Russia; in my opinion, he would have withdrawn them long ago; and, in my opinion, he would have long ago raised the blockade. If the President had not been caught in this scheme of trade and barter for a league our soldiers would not be in Russia at this time, and the Russian people would be permitted to enjoy whatever assistance would come to them by reason of opening up channels of trade and business.

Mr. President, if there is anything that is settled beyond peradventure in the American mind it is that every people have a right to set up their own form of government and to establish their own system and method of living. If they see fit to have a soviet government, it is their business. They must settle it for themselves. While I would prefer to see a different kind of government from that which apparently prevails in Russia, nevertheless it is for the Russian people to settle it.

I say, then, in conclusion, let us raise the blockade against the Russian people. Let us show the Christian spirit of the American people toward those struggling, suffering, starving masses, and let us bring every single soldier not only out of Russia but out of Europe. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are you people just strangers here, or are you those who come here constantly and do not propose to be law-abiding citizens? You know you have not any right to do that. Do you think you are making for law and order in this country by violating every law of the Senate?

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday the Committee on Foreign Relations, by a vote of 9 to 8, not only accepted certain amendments to the treaty which had been considered before that time but also voted in favor of certain reservations. I want to direct attention to only a single one of those reservations.

Some time ago a few Senators who are in favor of a treaty, but who also desired some explicit declaration in reference to the meaning of certain articles of the treaty, tentatively agreed upon four or five separate reservations. Those reservations were published in the RECORD at the request of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. One of those reservations, which we denominate the second reservation, was offered as a substitute for the one which was adopted by the committee. Now, it has been suggested to a number of Senators that in reality there is no difference between the reservation numbered 2 which was adopted yesterday by the committee by a majority of one and the reservation numbered 2 which was printed in the RECORD. I wish to make it clear that there is a very great difference between the two.

The committee reservation reads:

> That the United States declines to assume under the provisions of article 10, or any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere in controversies between other nations whether members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression—

And so forth.

That is the proposed committee reservation bearing upon article 10. The proposed substitute, which was entered in the RECORD, reads as follows:

> That the advice and suggestions of the council as to the means of carrying the said obligations (article 10) into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces, or economic measures, can, under the Constitution, be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures, shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

These are the two opposing reservations.

It will be noted, Mr. President, that in both the committee proposal and in the substitute proposal this country is at liberty, if the Congress so decides at the time, either to interfere or to refrain from interference with an assault or threatened assault by one nation to destroy or annihilate another. In that respect both of them agree. It is claimed, therefore, that they both mean the same thing. But they do not mean the same thing.

The committee reservation by its most positive declaration that the purpose of this Government will be noninterference with any kind of war or threatened war invites and encourages such war.

Our substitute reservation, leaving us in harmony with the other great nations in a general purpose to prevent such wrong and aggressive wars, although the Congress alone must determine whether and to what extent, if any, we shall interfere, discourages such criminal wars.

In other words, the committee reservation by the most positive declaration says to the world that no matter how unjust or how criminal is a threatened assault the United States will not interfere.

Our substitute approving the general purpose is a notice to the world that in all probability the United States will interfere if the threatened war is inherently wrong and criminal, or if its effect will be to bring on another great World War.

The one puts us in the attitude of precondoning such offense, leaving us, of course, the right to make war—which in all probability we never would make if war was not made on us.

The other puts us in the attitude of precondemning such offenses, leaving us, of course, the right to say at the time whether the threat is of such importance as to justify us in making war.

The one is a positive declaration that we shall not prevent a threatened war of conquest unless we change our minds at the time of the occurrence.

The other is a positive declaration that we shall prevent such a threatened war unless at the time we shall feel that we are not justified in so doing.

The one says to the would-be assassin, "Beware! We are against criminal assassination."

The other says to the would-be assassin, "Be not afraid. We do not purpose to restrain you."

Admitting that in either reservation the United States is relieved from any legal or moral duty to conform to the advice of the council, which of these two reservations would better conserve the peace of the world, admitting that neither of them binds us morally or legally to enter into any conduct of war unless Congress shall so decide at the time of the occurrence?

Mr. President, the committee reservation is far worse than an amendment striking out article 10 entirely. By simply disagreeing to article 10 we should not advertise to the world that we had abandoned our old American policy of encouraging the peaceful settlement of international disputes. By this reservation we declare to the world that we have no concern whatever in international disputes, no matter how threatening to the peace of the world or how much they may shock the moral sense of the people of the world.

Mr. President, the proposal of the committee, adopted by a majority of one, ought not to prevail in the Senate of the United States.

I was constrained, Mr. President, to make this terse explanation of the difference between the two because of the reiterated statement that in effect they were the same thing.

A substitute for the committee reservations has been prepared by me, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION OF TREATY TO BE MOVED AS SUBSTITUTE FOR COMMITTEE PROPOSALS.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatamala, Haiti, The Hejaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Siam, Czecho-Slovakia, and Uruguay of the one part, and Germany of the other part, consummated at Versailles, in the Republic of France, on the 28th day of June, 1919, with the following reservations and understandings to be made a part of the treaty:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by the United States, as provided in article 1, the United States shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled.

2. That no obligation rests upon the United States under article 10, unless and until the council of the league of nations shall advise, and that the advice and suggestions of the council as to the means of carrying the said obligations into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces, or economic measures, can, under the Constitution, be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces, or economic measures shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

3. The United States reserves to itself the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not by this covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in the said treaty contained.

5. That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan, under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty, as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments of date May 25, 1915.

6. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties," in article 15, to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein, and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies, and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I trust the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will not prevail. The Senator is opposed to a penalty for violating the regulations. That, as I understand, is the gist of his amendment. There is a vast amount of administrative work that will be connected with industrial alcohol under the provisions of Title III. It will be impossible to accomplish that work without a great number of regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. There are other departments of the Government where the head of the department must prescribe regulations, and that is particularly true in the Department of the Interior, where, for the administration of the mining laws and the agricultural land laws, regulations must be prescribed, and it is frequently provided in statutes that a violation of the regulations subjects the violator to a penalty, and it is right that the statutes should so provide.

The regulation does not prescribe the penalty. It is the law itself that prescribes the penalty for violating a regulation. So many of these objections to penalties for violating a regulation seem to proceed upon the theory that the regulation prescribes the penalty, but it is the law which prescribes the penalty for the violation of a regulation which the law authorizes the head of the department or the bureau to make, and it is in effect, of course, a violation of the law itself, because it is a violation of the regulation made in pursuance of law authorizing the particular regulation.

I trust that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, objection is made to the proposed amendment upon the ground of want of power of the Congress to enact legislation of that character as well as upon the ground of the alleged unwisdom of the provision as a matter of policy.

Whatever virtue there may be in the contention that the provision is an unwise one, there is no room whatever for argument as to its being within the power of Congress to legislate in this manner. The matter has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S.), and determined so clearly and so directly that no room at all is left for argument upon the proposition, to my mind. The court in that case considered the forest-reserve act, which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to "make such rules and regulations and establish such service as will insure the objects of such reservation, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction," and it was then provided that "any violation of the provisions of this act or such rules or regulations shall be punished" as in the act provided.

The validity of that statute was attacked in a very large number of cases in the public-land States, and I may say that the decisions were divided upon the subject, and generally against the validity of the statute; but upon the matter coming before the Supreme Court of the United States it was ruled that the statute was entirely within the power of Congress, the court saying in that connection, briefly, as follows:

> The defendants were indicted for grazing sheep on the Sierra Forest Reserve without having obtained the permission required by the regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture. They demurred on the ground that the forest-reserve act of 1891 was unconstitutional, in so far as it delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture power to make rules and regulations and made a violation thereof a penal offense. Their several demurrers were sustained. The Government brought the case here under that clause of the criminal-appeals act (Mar. 2, 1907, ch. 2564, 34 Stat., 1246), which allows a writ of error where the decision complained of was based upon the invalidity of the statute.
> The Federal courts have been divided on the question as to whether violations of those regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture constitute a crime. The rules were held to be valid for civil purposes in Dastervignes v. United States, 122 Fed Rep., 30; United States v. Dastervignes, 118 Fed. Rep., 199; United States v. Shannon, 151 Fed. Rep., 863; S. C., 160 Fed. Rep., 870. They were also sustained in criminal prosecutions in United States v. Deguirro, 152 Fed. Rep., 568; United States v. Domingo, 152 Fed. Rep., 566; United States v. Bale, 156 Fed. Rep., 687; United States v. Rizzinelli, 182 Fed. Rep., 675. But the regulations were held to be invalid in United States v. Blasingame, 116 Fed. Rep., 654; United States v. Matthews, 146 Fed. Rep., 306; Dent v. United States, 8 Arizona, 138.

The court fully sustains the statute. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go into a discussion of the argument upon which the conclusion of the court was based; but, Mr. President, it has been stated in this connection that the decision in that case is not a warrant for a statute of this character, because that referred to regulations concerning the property of the United States, namely, the public lands which had been placed in forest reserves. The decision, however, proceeds upon no such basis whatever. It proceeds upon the basis that in innumerable cases details in connection with the administration of laws enacted by Congress must be intrusted to the various departments, and the administration must be in accordance with certain rules and regulations prescribed by them, and that in cases of that character it is entirely within the purview of Congress to declare that violations of rules and regulations of that character shall be criminal.

I merely take the time of the Senate to refer to some of the cases upon which the argument of the court proceeds. I read as follows:

> From the beginning of the Government various acts have been passed conferring upon executive officers power to make rules and regulations, not for the government of their departments, but for administering the laws which did govern. None of these statutes could confer legislative power. But when Congress had legislated and indicated its will, it could give to those who were to act under such general provisions "power to fill up the details" by the establishment of administrative rules and regulations, the violation of which could be punished by fine or imprisonment fixed by Congress, or by penalties fixed by Congress or measured by the injury done.

wholesome teas. With this unlawfulness as a predicate the executive officers were authorized to make rules and regulations appropriate to the several matters covered by the various acts. A violation of these rules was then made an offense punishable as prescribed by Congress. But in making these regulations the officers did not legislate. They did not go outside of the circle of that which the act itself had affirmatively required to be done, or treated as unlawful if done. But confining themselves within the field covered by the statute they could adopt regulations of the nature they had thus been generally authorized to make, in order to administer the law and carry the statute into effect.

Then reference is made to a number of State decisions sustaining the validity of statutes of a similar character.

Accordingly, Mr. President, the question which addresses itself to the Senate now is merely one of the wisdom or unwisdom of the provision proposed; and it does seem to me there is no reason to complain about it at all. The rules and regulations are all prescribed, they are published, and if at any time they meet with the disapproval of Congress the remedy is easy, namely, to declare the regulations invalid.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is some difference between this case and the case which the Supreme Court decided. There is a very good opportunity, I think, to differentiate between them. There is some difference between the regulations referred to in the particular amendment that is now pending and any case that was ever decided. However, I am not going to argue on any uncertain legal proposition. I am going to do it on the theory that it is not wise, that it is not fair, and it is not just in this particular instance, where I have made the motion to strike out the language.

There will be a great many regulations necessary, undoubtedly. There is in all such matters. But this language says:

Whoever otherwise violates any of the provisions of this title or of regulations lawfully made thereunder.

It is a basket clause; it has no reference to any particular thing, but to anything. It covers everything.

I wish to call attention to the fact that these are regulations in relation to property not owned by the United States but by individuals. One of the regulations might be that the establishment would have to be painted with red paint, and if the owner painted it with white paint he would be violating one of the regulations, although everybody could see that the difference would be almost immaterial.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not agree with the Senator as to that. If I had followed the opinion of the court further, it would be found that the court finds justification for the conclusion at which it arrived from a number of statutes authorizing municipalities to make rules and regulations concerning a lot of matters within the municipality, even authorizing the municipalty to make penal a violation of the rules and regulations and ordinances.

However, Mr. President, it has been uniformly held that no matter how wide the scope may be of a grant to a municipality to enact ordinances, if those ordinances are unreasonable or not adapted to the end in view, they are void. So, if there is no reason whatever why red paint should be used rather than white paint, as proposed by the Senator, that rule or regulation would be held void and would not bind anybody.

Mr. NORRIS. There might be some reason for it. The commissioner might desire that there should be a uniformity of appearance, in order that his agents or detectives might better tell at a distance what kind of plant they were in the vicinity of.

I gave another illustration earlier in the discussion, where one of the regulations might provide that it should be locked with a Yale lock. The commissioner might do that with a perfectly honest intention, and yet no harm ever come if the owner of the property were not able to get a Yale lock and got some other lock. Everybody knows that a Yale lock is a good one, and he might provide for that kind of regulation with perfect honesty; yet I do not believe a man ought to be punished to the same extent if he violates a regulation of that kind as though he were actually withdrawing from the plant alcohol, for instance, that had not been denatured and was selling it in violation of law, all of which is covered by the law itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If there were no reason why a Yale lock should be used rather than any other kind of a lock, that regulation would be held void. If there was a good reason why it should be used, the regulation would be upheld and enforced by public opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not saying that such a regulation would even be unreasonable; and yet you subject a man who violates that regulation to the same extent that you subject a man who absolutely withdraws alcohol and sells it in violation of law. You put him in jail just the same.

Mr. STERLING. Let me say in reply to the latter suggestion by the Senator from Nebraska that the court can temper the punishment according to the grade or seriousness of the offense.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; somewhat.

Mr. STERLING. There is a great limit. The fine in the first instance does not exceed $1,000. A fine of $5 might be imposed according to the offense.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the rules and regulations that are authorized to be formulated by the commissioner under the law must be rules and regulations that are reasonable and needed to carry out the purpose of the law. Any such regulations as the Senator indicated in the example he has given to us would by any court I think be held utterly unreasonable. The commissioner can not make and prescribe all kinds of rules, whatever his notion may be. He is necessarily confined to rules that are required to carry out the purposes of the law. If he steps beyond that, no court will sustain him and no conviction can be had. I am satisfied of that, and that has been the tenor of the decisions of our courts from time immemorial.

My friend, the Senator from Nebraska himself has had great experience as a judge on the bench. He is a good lawyer and knows that if any unreasonable and improper rules and regulations, such as those he has stated about the paint and about the lock and all that, were attempted to be enforced, no court would hold a violation of such rules to be subject to the penalties of this law. In other words any court would hold such a rule as utterly unjustifiable and unreasonable.

Furthermore, in laws of this kind as in the administration of our public land laws and in many other administrative features of our laws, it is necessary in order to give effect to the law to leave rules and regulations to a limited extent more or less to be prescribed by the officials who administer the law. This comes from the fact that it is utterly impossible in any law to lay down in advance all the minutiæ of rules and regulations that are required for its enforcement. To wipe out the provision entirely would be a mistake. The commissioner might prescribe a necessary and important rule, actually needed to carry out the provisions of the law, and yet with the amendment which the Senator suggests a man would be immune if he violated such a rule.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Minnesota in his last statement is erroneous, careful and able as he is. In my judgment the striking out of this language would remove it from a portion of the bill where it is liable to do great injustice and still leave all the powers any commissioner needs or ought to have in a fair and honest administration of the law. For instance, under the same heading, in section 10, it speaks of alcohol to be denatured, and says:

Alcohol lawfully denatured may under regulations be sold free of tax either for domestic use or for export.

"Under regulations." I am not seeking to strike that out. Suppose the commissioner provided a method, and he very likely will when this law goes into effect, by which you could denature alcohol. You would not be entitled to take it out of bond until you complied with those regulations, and if you took it out of bond you would be liable for taking it out of bond contrary to law, and the penalty is fixed, it is definite there. Here is the clause that I am trying to strike out:

Whoever otherwise violates any of the provisions.

I even think that might be omitted, because there is a definite provision fixed for a violation of almost everything you can think of; and then this basket clause is put in with a basket-regulation clause added to it. It goes much further, in my humble judgment, than is necessary or than ever will be necessary. It can not do any good here and may do a great deal of harm. For instance, this very section provides that—

Whoever operates an industrial-alcohol plant or denaturing plant without complying with the provisions of this title—

Can be punished, and so forth.

In section 14 it is provided that—

Whenever any alcohol is lost by evaporation or other shrinkage, leakage, casualty, or unavoidable cause during distillation, redistillation, denaturation, withdrawal, piping, shipment, warehousing, storage, packing, transfer, or recovery of any such alcohol the commissioner may remit or refund any tax incurred—

And so forth.

There is nothing said there about rules and regulations, but there is no doubt the commissioner will make some under which, if a man is entitled to that refund, he will come under those regulations and make his application and his showing, so that everyone will have to comply with the same rule and the same regulation.

My contention is that this is not only unnecessary, that it will not help in a fair and honest administration of the law, but that it may be the subject, if handled by some unconscionable commissioner, of much wrong, much trouble, and much difficulty.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that we ought to be careful in the enactment of this prohibitory law, carrying out an amendment that I, as everybody here knows, favored from the beginning. I favored it for many years before it was adopted. We ought to be careful that we do not put upon the statute books of the United States a law that will by its unreasonableness or its unpopularity bring this great and beneficial law into disrepute before the people. We can go too far and be unreasonable. I think we are doing it when we provide here by a basket clause for regulations that can do no good as far as an honest and fair enforcement of every penalty in the law is concerned, but may get the law into disrepute.

Mr. President, I do not care to say any more. I tried in the committee to strike out this provision and failed there as I may fail here. It seems to me that, looking at it only as a friend, and as sincere a friend as there is here of this kind of legislation, it is a mistake.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the Senator I suppose has observed that this is the only penal clause in Title III and that the expression "otherwise violates any of the provisions of this title" refers to all the provisions of the title. Nowhere else in Title III are there any provisions imposing punishment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota, in charge of the bill, whether Title I was predicated or is to be enacted into law entirely upon what is called the war power?

Mr. STERLING. Title I of the bill is enacted really in pursuance of the war prohibition act of November 21, 1918, and is for the enforcement of that act. That is the primary purpose of Title I. That act, as the Senator will remember, refers to the sale of malt and vinous liquors and prohibits the sale of any intoxicating or vinous liquors.

Mr. SHIELDS. That act was enacted entirely under the war power vested in Congress?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; but the act not only extends during the period of the war but until the termination of demobilization, as shall be proclaimed by the President of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Demobilization was considered as an incident to the war, and therefore it was extended under the war power. At this time, since the war is over in fact, what is it intended Title I shall apply to?

Mr. STERLING. Title I will apply to sales of malt and vinous liquors up until the period of demobilization is terminated, and it so provides.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator does not quite understand my inquiry. I mean what state of fact is it intended to apply to the demobilization of troops?

Mr. STERLING. It applies to this state of facts. I may say to the Senator that the troops are not yet demobilized. It applies to the situation of the process, if I may so call it, of demobilization, the return of soldiers, and so forth.

Mr. SHIELDS. I comprehend that. The great bulk of the Army has been demobilized.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. How much remains undemobilized?

Mr. STERLING. I am not able to state the number not yet demobilized.

Mr. SHIELDS. Perhaps 300,000 or 400,000?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; three or four hundred thousand at least.

Mr. SHIELDS. They are demobilized at certain camps or posts?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator now remember how many posts or camps are being maintained for demobilization purposes?

Mr. STERLING. No, I do not recall, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Some three or four, I understand.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. One of them, I believe, is in the State of New York?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator not know that as a matter of fact all the demobilization posts or camps, except the one in the State of New York, are located in States which have stricter laws concerning the manufacture, transportation, importation, and sale or other disposition of liquors than even this proposed act; that this bill really is only necessary in order to protect the camp in the State of New York; and that it is wholly unnecessary and wholly gratuitous, I might say, as to the other 47 States of the Union?

Mr. STERLING. Well, I do not quite agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. SHIELDS. To what possible place can it apply or where is it needed other than at the camp in the State of New York?

Mr. STERLING. I think it is needed not only for the purposes of demobilization and until the period of demobilization is over, but for the good of the returning soldiers who have been in fact demobilized.

Mr. SHIELDS. And who have been discharged?

Mr. STERLING. And have been discharged from the service.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought the Senator meant that; but that is beyond the power of Congress. Congress has no power over the discharged soldier. It has power only over the soldier who is in the service.

Mr. STERLING. It is within the power of Congress to pass the law, and the law will accomplish that much, if you may so call it, incidental good.

Mr. SHIELDS. Congress should not proceed upon a false basis, should it?

Mr. STERLING. It is the basis of the argument of Judge Hand, of the southern district of New York, just a few days ago in a decision he pronounced upon the subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will not insist that Congress has jurisdiction over the soldier who has been discharged or his safety or discipline?

Mr. STERLING. Judge Hand goes into that subject at considerable length. I am not citing the discharged soldier as the ground for the enactment of the law.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion? I wish to quote the language of the law.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator permit me to finish?

Mr. NELSON. We are not attempting to repeal existing law.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to have the Senator not interrupt me until I get one more matter of fact before the Senate. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota—he is equally familiar with this and is a member of the committee—that we have a statute which forbids the sale of any intoxicating beverages to a soldier or sailor in uniform, I believe.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. That statute is now in force and applies to the whole United States?

Mr. NELSON. That is true.

Mr. SHIELDS. The last section of the pending measure reads:

SEC. 7. None of the provisions of this act shall be construed to repeal any of the provisions of the "war prohibition act," or to limit or annul any order or regulation prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or disposition of intoxicating liquors within certain prescribed zones or districts—

And the Senator knows that covers every camp—

nor shall the provisions of this act be construed to prohibit the use of the power of the military or naval authorities to enforce the regulations of the President or Secretary of War or Navy issued in pursuance to law, prohibiting the manufacture, use, possession, sale, or other disposition of intoxicating liquors during the period of the war and demobilization thereafter.

My purpose in reading that was to call attention to the fact of the existence of the legislation there referred to in addition to the statute to which I called attention, and which prohibits the sale to a soldier in uniform of intoxicating liquor, so as to ask the Senator have we not now upon the statute books ample Federal legislation, to say nothing of how it is supplemented by State legislation in every State where there is a camp save one—47 out of the 48—to protect the soldier in the Army or in the process of demobilization? If that is the case, this proposed statute is not really a good-faith statute, is not founded upon facts which would give Congress jurisdiction to enact it, but is really a prohibition law to take effect before the constitutional amendment goes into operation under the guise of being for the protection of soldiers when it is not needed for that purpose.

As I remember—and if I am not correct I wish the Senator would correct me—the amendment commonly called the prohibition amendment to the Constitution was passed by both Houses before the war-time prohibition bill was enacted?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I think the Senator from Tennessee is right about that.

Mr. SHIELDS. And there is a provision in the constitutional amendment that it shall not take effect, I believe, until some time next February?

Mr. STERLING. Next January.

Mr. SHIELDS. The constitutional amendment, of course, can not take effect until then. When that amendment was passed by the Senate and by the other House it was understood that it would not take effect until the January succeeding. Every State prohibition law, I think—I know it is true of the law in my State, and I have supported all such laws, as I have supported every prohibition measure here—always gives some months or some years of grace to the business that is being legislated out of existence. One of the reasons for fixing the time when the constitutional amendment should take effect nearly a year in the future was to give those who had large sums invested in intoxicating beverages and also in the manufacturing plants some grace in order to arrange their business and to dispose of it.

Now, is it not in very bad faith, after the war is over, under the pretense of passing a war measure and of protecting the soldiers who are being demobilized, when there is ample law for that purpose in every State except one where the soldiers will be demobilized, and ample Federal law in addition, to extend prohibition under the war power of Congress to 48 States, except a place in one State having a radius of 10 miles, on the ground that it is for the protection of the demobilized soldiers or the soldiers who are in the process of demobilization?

This is a great moral measure, and I do not think those who advocate it in the Congress of the United States should do any immoral thing and proceed upon a false basis in order to anticipate the constitutional amendment that is going to wipe the whole traffic out of existence, and very properly so.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to offer an amendment, having said that much in favor of it, to which the Senator from South Dakota may reply. Unfortunately, I write such a hand that it can not be read by others, and I will read the amendment myself. At the end of Title I, I propose to insert the following:

Provided, That this title shall only apply to the territory for a radius of 10 miles from the center of the demobilizing posts or camps of the United States Army in States that have no statute prohibiting the manufacture, importation, transportation, and sale of intoxicating beverages.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that his amendment will operate as a repeal of existing law. This is the language of the law:

After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

So that this law runs just as far in the future as the law to which the Senator has referred. The law in reference to zones around cantonments and camps only runs while the war lasts and until the treaty of peace is ratified; but the provision I have read—and we are not seeking to repeal it—runs until the President has proclaimed that the period of demobilization has ended. The pending measure is simply to carry that into effect.

We do not know how long the treaty may hang fire, and it is possible that under this law there might be a brief interregnum. We have troops on the Rhine in Europe, and under the provisions of the German treaty they may remain there. There will be no demobilization, in fact, until all our troops are brought home, and we can not tell when the President will issue the proclamation.

Mr. SHIELDS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; I have nothing more to say.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand the Senator to mean that there are not now Federal statutes upon the books that amply take care of the soldiers who are still in the service?

Mr. NELSON. What I mean is that the prohibition law to which I have referred is now in effect, and we are not seeking to repeal it.

Mr. SHIELDS. But does it not cover demobilization?

Mr. NELSON. It extends to the end of the war, which means until the treaty of peace has been ratified, and then to the time of demobilization, or whichever period comes first.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does not the statutes referred to expressly include demobilization?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it runs until the termination of demobilization.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the law now?

Mr. NELSON. It reads:

Until the conclusion of the present war and until the termination of demobilization——

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It continues:

the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President.

That is the law now.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, and therefore there is no necessity for adding anything to it.

Now, I will ask the Senator this question: Is it not a fact that in every State, except New York, there are ample local laws to protect the soldiers now being demobilized?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in the answer to that question I will say there are not. One of the demobilization camps is in the vicinity of Washington, namely, Camp Meade, Md. Another is Camp Dix, in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. SHIELDS. That makes three.

Mr. STERLING. And Camp Grant, in the State of Illinois, which is not, as I understand, a prohibition State as yet, although a local-option State.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; Illinois is a prohibition State.

Mr. STERLING. But I do not think they have State-wide prohibition there.

Mr. SHIELDS. Have we not a Federal statute prohibiting the sale of liquor around demobilization camps until peace has been declared?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; until the period of demobilization.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, taking the view the Senator has, there are three States, I believe, which he has named, where the local law may not be ample.

Mr. STERLING. I do not have any others in mind now.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator believe that it is good faith now, on that pretense, to legislate for the other 45 States?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly there is no breach of faith on the part of the Government in enacting this legislation. Now, let me tell the Senator briefly why, if I may.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. This is the situation: We have the law of November 21, 1918, which simply prohibits the sale of intoxicating malt and vinous liquors, and stops there, save that a penalty is prescribed for violating the law; but the great difficulty has been, and is now, in the enforcement of that law. Title I of this bill is for the purpose of providing the means of enforcement, and one of the means is the definition of intoxicating liquors. The Senator understands what that definition is. The difficulty of enforcing the law is expressed in a letter from the Attorney General, written to the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], from which I will read. The Attorney General says:

I do not think the wisdom of such action on the part of Congress admits of doubt—

He refers to the pending bill—

I do not think the wisdom of such action on the part of Congress admits of doubt. It goes without saying, I think, that if a law merely prohibits intoxicating liquors and leaves to the jury in each case, from the evidence produced, to determine whether the liquor in question is, in fact, intoxicating or not, its efficient and uniform administration will be impossible.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I do not controvert that, and I do not oppose it; but the suggestion I am presenting to the Senator is that it is proposed to pass a law that applies to 45 States that do not need such a law and do not come within the evil intended to be legislated against. What power have we, after the war is over, to enact such legislation?

Mr. STERLING. So long as we are engaged in the work of demobilizing the soldiers, until the termination of that demobilization, there will be need for this law. The Attorney General continues:

The term "intoxicating" is too indefinite and uncertain to produce anything like uniform results in such trials. Of course, there are certain liquors so generally known to be intoxicating that any court would take judicial notice of this fact.

We have specified those liquors in the bill, applying the one-half per cent to the malt, vinous, and spirituous liquors other than those designated in the bill.

But in the absence of a definition by Congress there will be innumerable beverages as to which the claim will be made that they do not contain enough alcohol to render them intoxicating. These contentions will produce endless confusion and uncertainty. These, I think, are substantially the reasons why Congress should itself provide a definition.

The importance of this matter has been very much emphasized by our present efforts to enforce the war prohibition act. The claim is being made that beer containing as much as 2¾ per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating. And if this must be made a question of fact to be decided by each jury, but little in the way of practical results can be expected. I am, however, most earnestly insisting that, in view of the rulings for many years by the Internal Revenue Department, Congress meant when it used the word "beer" a beverage of the class generally known as beer if it contained as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

He says further:

If I finally succeed in this contention, as I believe I will, much of the difficulty will be cleared away. But in the district courts there is a conflict of opinion. Several courts have sustained my contention and a few others have ruled to the contrary. While I have faith that the Supreme Court will sustain my contention, it will, of course, be some months before a ruling can be had in that court. Hence I think that when Congress, in the meantime, is passing an enforcement act it should take care that this embarrassing question shall not be left to impede the administration of the law, no matter what the ruling of the Supreme Court may later be.

I will now read from the opinion of Judge Hand. This language appeals to me very strongly. He says:

A war emergency, however, of serious import arises in respect to the period of demobilization. During that period there has been and still is a stream of enlisted men coming into and remaining within the United States. The great stimulus engendered by the popular excitement which attended the war and by their expectation of having to combat their country's foes has disappeared, and a more or less purposeless and dull routine has followed as the inevitable lot of the young soldiers. Under such circumstances men are especially subject to all the temptations which a lack of immediate definite purpose, as well as a certain relaxation of discipline, are likely to entail. During the same period the country has been filled with other men but recently discharged from military service, a considerable number of whom are said in the moving papers before me to lack employment. There is, besides all this, the general restlessness which has apparently always followed the termination of a great war. Under such circumstances it can strongly be argued that the free use of stimulants may have peculiar dangers to the community. At all events, I do not see how it can be fairly said that no emergency exists directly growing out of the war, or that such emergency may not be affected by such a thing as the liquor traffic.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, no lawyer will say that Judge Hand's opinion is sound as to discharged soldiers; that is too well settled for controversy. I do not combat a suggestion made in a letter in regard to the enforcement of the law, but the proposition I presented was not answered by the Senator at all. My proposition is that it is all right in the demobilization camps to provide for its enforcement, but why spread it all over the United States, over 45 States, where there are no camps? Does the Senator think for a moment there are going to be camps in Arizona or California or Tennessee or the Dakotas or in other States? We know that new camps are not going to be established there, when a sufficient number of camps already exist in other places.

Mr. STERLING. I think the entire answer to the Senator from Tennessee is simply this: The law is on the statute books prohibiting the sale of malt and vinous liquors, and Title I of this bill provides for the enforcement of that law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from South Dakota in order that one matter may be cleared up in my mind at least. I want to ask if the enactment of Title I in any way deprives the President of his authority to suspend the war-time prohibition act?

Mr. STERLING. I should say, without having given the question much thought, that it does. It does not extend, but simply provides for the enforcement of the law now on the statute books, which will expire at the termination of demobilization—on the proclamation of that fact by the President. It goes just that far and no further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then it does not take away from the President the right to issue a proclamation suspending the act?

Mr. JONES of Washington. He can not suspend the act. He can declare demobilization at an end, and then the act falls.

Mr. STERLING. Upon his proclamation to the effect that demobilization is over, then the act is at an end.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, demobilization might be over, but if we are not technically at peace the act is still in force.

Mr. STERLING. I accept the correction, because it is during the war and until peace is declared.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This act does not deprive the President of any power that he has under the law as it stands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I see. I wanted to be clear about that, because I think the Senator from Tennessee touched upon that, but that question was not covered in the colloquy that went on between him and the Senator from South Dakota.

Assuming that the state of war which is now technically in existence shall come to a conclusion in the near future, is it the opinion of the Senator from South Dakota that this act, if carried out in good faith, will terminate when the demobilization is actually complete?

Mr. STERLING. Peace having been declared?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Peace having been declared.

Mr. STERLING. And there being a termination of demobilization?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. If the act is carried out in good faith, is it the opinion of the Senator from South Dakota that the act will cease with the actual termination of demobilization?

Mr. STERLING. Peace having been declared.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Peace having been declared.

Mr. President, I desire to make just a single observation. The demobilization is now 92 per cent complete. Only 8 per cent of the men who were enlisted into the Army for this war are still in the service; and if the plans of the War Department are carried out—and thus far it is fair to say they have been ahead of their program in the matter of demobilization—the demobilization will be complete on September 30, the end of this very month. So, as the Senator from Tennessee has indicated in his observations, Title I of this act is really for the protection of 8 per cent of the men of the total emergency army; and when they are demobilized and are out of the service and back in civil life it is difficult to see what the purpose of the act will be thereafter.

Of course if the demobilization is completed before the treaty of peace is signed and proclaimed, then certainly as soon as the treaty of peace is signed and proclaimed the President is in duty bound to make that evident by a declaration, and this act is suspended; and if things move along in the way that many of us assume they will move along, if events transpire as we assume they will transpire, this act will not be in operation much more than two months or six weeks.

Mr. STERLING. Granting that, there should be the means of enforcement as long as it is in operation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes; I am not contending against the enforcement; but I think there is a rather interesting situation confronting the Congress when it is passing a bill to enforce a law that is about to go out of existence.

Mr. SHIELDS. And only applicable to a very small territory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think myself that Title I should be enacted. The curious thing to my mind is that there has been no enforcement provision of the so-called war-time prohibition act before this time, and that we are not called upon to enact an enforcement provision until the act itself is almost ready to die.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, am I to conclude from the observations just made by the Senator from New York that within two months the peace treaty will be ratified?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not say "ratified"; I said "peace declared."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, to my mind the argument of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] proceeds upon an entirely erroneous basis. He seems to proceed upon the theory that we are now legislating prohibition for the entire United States, the occasion for legislation of that character, in his judgment, extending only to those localities in a few States in which there are demobilization camps.

That is not the situation at all. Prohibition now exists all over the United States, and has existed since the 1st of July, by virtue of the prohibition act. That act provides that it shall remain in force until peace is declared and demobilization is complete, as proclaimed by the President.

When that act was passed undoubtedly Congress realized that some such condition of affairs would ensue as has followed; namely, that the Army would be rapidly demobilized after actual hostilities ceased, and that during some part of the process of demobilization only a small number of men would remain to be demobilized, and they would be demobilized in a limited number of camps. Congress also recognized that it had enacted two other statutes. One was that sales of liquor to men in uniform should not be tolerated, and, second, that certain zones around the camps might be prescribed within which the sale should not take place. Congress, having all of these matters in mind, enacted this law under which prohibition, as I say, now exists all over the United States by virtue of this statute.

It may have been very unwise in Congress to enact that legislation. It may have been entirely unjustified. The Senator from Tennessee may be correct that the law ought never to have been enacted in that way; that it ought to have provided that as demobilization progressed certain States should be exempted from the operation of the general act, and as it progressed further that certain sections of other States should be exempted from the operation of the act until no region remained subject to the operation of the general act except the demobilization camps and a certain territory in the vicinity of those demobilization camps. But the Congress of the United States did not do that. It provided that prohibition should go into force and effect on the 1st of July all over the United States, and should remain in force and effect all over the United States until demobilization was complete, until the last man had been demobilized, as proclaimed by the President.

That was the policy of Congress. Congress adheres to that policy. It is now unlawful to sell liquor in any of the States of the Union. It is not necessary now to inquire into the wisdom of that. With the situation as I have indicated, the question arises as to whether we shall leave that prohibition statute on the books without any real method of enforcing it and making it an active statute, or whether we shall provide the means by which it shall go into effect so long as it lasts. That is the purpose of this statute. It is not primarily to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the various States of the Union, those within which there are demobilization camps as well as those within which there are not, because that condition already exists. It is simply a statute making effective and vigorous the prohibition which already exists by virtue of another statute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, there is one further amendment to which my attention has been called since I offered certain amendments in behalf of the committee a while ago. I send to the desk an amendment to come in at the end of section 1 of Title I.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 1, on page 2, line 7, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine or sweet cider, nor to any liquor or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, or porter is manufactured, but containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, if such liquor or liquid shall be otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter.

Mr. STERLING. That is exactly the same amendment that has been made to section 1 of Title II. There is no reason why it should not be made as an amendment to section 1 of Title I as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the bill having reached the stage where no further amendments may be proposed, I embrace the opportunity to discuss a matter which runs to the vitals of constitutional amendments. I waited purposely until there was no opportunity to offer further amendments.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. May I ask the Senator from Arizona if he desires to speak on the prohibition bill, or on some other subject?

Mr. ASHURST. I wanted to speak on the bill, with reference to the nature of constitutional amendments. I want to speak on the bill; but if there is any other business to which Senators wish to address themselves, or if the Senate wishes to proceed to the consideration of other bills, I will very gladly yield, or yield the floor. In fact, while as in the case of all other men a speech imprisoned within one's bosom is a very tyrannical thing, and we never get any peace until we get it out, I am very willing to postpone it until some other occasion, although I felt that inasmuch as it related to this bill it ought to be delivered now, if at all; and I would not do so at all except that several members of the Judiciary Committee have requested me to deliver the address. If it were not for that I would not care to go on at this time; but if there is any business that any Senator wishes to have transacted I can easily keep the speech confined for some time.

Mr. NELSON. Will my good friend the Senator from Arizona allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Let us pass the pending bill, and then the Senator from New Jersey will call up the bill he has in charge and have it made the unfinished business, and then the Senator can make his speech.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very willing to do that. I think that is a very appropriate suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word or two about the bill which has just been passed. I shall only take a minute.

The bill is not all that every friend of temperance would like to have, but the Congress and the people of the country owe sincere thanks to the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate for framing such a fair and reasonable measure as it is. They have done their work splendidly. No doubt this law will be violated. The interests and elements it seeks to control have violated laws and defied authority in the past to such a very great extent that they largely brought about the very sentiment they denounce and which brought about the passage not only of the prohibition amendment but the war-time prohibition law and this law.

I wish to put in the RECORD a resolution which I introduced in the last Congress and which resulted in an investigation of the liquor interests and a report from the Committee on the Judiciary that ought to be made a permanent record. It shows this traffic to be such a lawless and disturbing element as to challenge the attention not only of the people of this country but the people of the world.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the part of the report which I hold in my hand. The committee consisted of Senators OVERMAN, KING, WOLCOTT, NELSON, and STERLING. The resolution was Senate resolution 307, introduced by me, and the committee finds every charge made in it "substantially" proved. This report fully justifies the action of the people and the Congress in outlawing the liquor traffic in this country forever, and it will be a mighty weapon to make the world dry. I ask that what I send to the Clerk's desk may be printed in the RECORD without reading in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPORT ON HEARINGS BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, UNITED STATES SENATE, ON SENATE RESOLUTION 307.

GERMAN PROPAGANDA.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I submit the report of the subcommittee to the full committee on the question of the investigation of the activities of the United States Brewers' Association and allied interests, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

BREWING AND LIQUOR INTERESTS AND GERMAN PROPAGANDA, AND BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

"The Committee on the Judiciary, having under consideration the resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate to call for certain evidence and documents relating to charges made against the United States Brewers' Association and allied interests and to report the result of their investigation to the Senate, have concluded their duties.

"The chairman appointed as a subcommittee to investigate the matters and things named in said resolution the following Senators: OVERMAN (chairman), KING, WOLCOTT, NELSON, and STERLING.

"The resolution directing the committee to make this investigation is here printed in full, as follows:

"Whereas Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Custodian of Alien Property, on or about September 14 made the following statement:

"'The facts will soon appear which will conclusively show that 12 or 15 German brewers of America, in association with the United States Brewers' Association, furnished the money, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, to buy a great newspaper in one of the chief cities of the Nation; and its publisher, without disclosing whose money had bought that organ of public opinion, in the very Capital of the Nation, in the shadow of the Capitol itself, has been fighting the battle of the liquor traffic.

"'When the traffic, doomed though it is, undertakes and seeks by these secret methods to control party nominations, party machinery, whole political parties, and thereby control the government of State and Nation, it is time the people know the truth.

"'The organized liquor traffic of the country is a vicious interest, because it has been unpatriotic, because it has been pro-German in its sympathies and its conduct. Around these great brewery organizations, owned by rich men, almost all of them are of German birth and sympathy, at least before we entered the war, has grown up the societies, all the organizations of this country intended to keep young German immigrants from becoming real American citizens.

"'It is around the sangerfests and sangerbunds and organizations of that kind, generally financed by the rich brewers, that the young Germans who come to America are taught to remember, first, the fatherland, and, second, America'; and

"Whereas it has been publicly and repeatedly charged against the United States Brewers' Association and allied brewing companies and interests that there is in the Department of Justice and in the office of a certain United States district attorney evidence showing—

"That the said United States Brewers' Association, brewing companies, and allied interests have in recent years made contributions to political campaigns on a great scale without precedent in the political history of the country and in violation of the laws of the land;

"That, in order to control legislation in State and Nation, they have exacted pledges from candidates to office, including Congressmen and United States Senators, before election, such pledges being on file;

"That, in order to influence public opinion to their ends, they have heavily subsidized the public press and stipulated when contracting for advertising space with the newspapers that a certain amount be editorial space, the literary material for the space being provided from the brewers' central office in New York;

"That, in order to suppress expressions of opinion hostile to their trade and political interests, they have set in operation an extensive system of boycotting of American manufacturers, merchants, railroads, and other interests;

"That, for the furthering of their political enterprises, they have erected a political organization to carry out their purposes;

"That they were allied to powerful suborganizations, among them the German-American Alliance, whose charter was revoked by the unanimous vote of Congress; the National Association of Commerce and Labor; and the Manufacturers and Dealers' Associations, and that they have their ramifications in other organizations neutral in character;

"That they have on file political surveys of States, counties, and districts tabulating the men and forces for and against them, and that they have paid large sums of money to citizens of the United States to advocate their cause and interests, including some in the Government employ;

"That they have defrauded the Federal Government by applying to their political corruption funds money which should have gone to the Federal Treasury in taxes;

"That they are attempting to build up in the country, through the control of such organizations as the united societies and by the manipulation of the foreign-language press, a political influence which can be turned to one or the other party, thus controlling electoral results;

"That they, or some of their organizations, have pleaded nolo contendre to charges filed against them and have paid fines aggregating large sums of money; Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to call upon the Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, and the Department of Justice and its United States district attorneys to produce the evidence and documents relating to the charges herein mentioned, and to subpœna any witnesses or documents relating thereto that it may find necessary, and to make a report of the result of such investigation and what is shown thereby to the Senate of the United States as promptly as possible.

"The subcommittee began its investigation on September 27, 1918. At the request of the subcommittee, the Secretary of War very kindly detailed from the Judge Advocate General's Department, United States Army, to aid the committee, Maj. E. Lowry Humes, formerly United States district attorney for the western district of Pennsylvania, and from the Military Intelligence Division, United States Army, Capt. George B. Lester, an attorney of New York, and also the Attorney General very kindly detailed from the Department of Justice Mr. William R. Benham, all of whom rendered most valuable assistance to the committee in the collection of evidence, the production of testimony, the examination of witnesses, and in the preparation of reports.

BREWING AND LIQUOR ACTIVITIES.

"The allegations and charges made in said resolution No. 307, hereinbefore set out, in regard to the brewing and liquor activities, were substantially sustained, as will appear from the printed record, volumes 1 and 2, herewith transmitted.

"Your committee in entering upon the investigation directed by said resolution No. 307 interpreted that resolution as requiring an inquiry into two subjects, to wit:

"1. The conduct and activities of the brewing and liquor interest, political and otherwise, was specifically demanded; and

"2. A general inquiry into pro-German propaganda and activities was required. The testimony taken having been printed, a review thereof is deemed unnecessary. Complying, however, with the mandate of the resolution requiring a report of the results established by the investigation, the following findings are herewith submitted for the information and attention of the Senate:

I.

"With regard to the conduct and activities of the brewing and liquor interests, the committee is of the opinion that the record clearly establishes the following facts:

"(a) That they have furnished large sums of money for the purpose of secretly controlling newspapers and periodicals.

"(b) That they have undertaken to and have frequently succeeded in controlling primaries, elections, and political organizations.

"(c) That they have contributed enormous sums of money to political campaigns in violation of the Federal statutes and the statutes of several of the States.

"(d) That they have exacted pledges from candidates for public office prior to the election.

"(e) That for the purpose of influencing public opinion they have attempted and partly succeeded in subsidizing the public press.

"(f) That to suppress and coerce persons hostile to and to compel support for them they have resorted to an extensive system of boycotting unfriendly American manufacturing and mercantile concerns.

"(g) That they have created their own political organization in many States and in smaller political units for the purpose of carrying into effect their own political will, and have financed the same with large contributions and assessments.

"(h) That with a view of using it for their own political purposes they contributed large sums of money to the German-American Alliance, many of the membership of which were disloyal and unpatriotic.

"(i) That they organized clubs, leagues, and corporations of various kinds for the purpose of secretly carrying on their political activities without having their interest known to the public.

"(j) That they improperly treated the funds expended for political purposes as a proper expenditure of their business and consequently failed to return the same for taxation under the revenue laws of the United States.

"(k) That they undertook through a cunningly conceived plan of advertising and subsidation to control and dominate the foreign-language press of the United States.

"(l) That they have subsidized authors of recognized standing in literary circles to write articles of their selection for many standard periodicals.

"(m) That for many years a working agreement existed between the brewing and distilling interests of the country by the terms of which the brewing interests contributed two-thirds and the distilling interests one-third of the political expenditures made by the joint interests."

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to-night further than to make the motion of which I have already given notice I would make at the conclusion of the consideration and passage of the prohibition bill. I move that we take up Senate bill 2472, so that it shall become the unfinished business of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I realize the importance and the necessity to the country of passing the bill that is now made the unfinished business, and I hope it will pass the Senate this evening. I feel that I would be guilty possibly if I should consume time just now. So I will withhold my address until some other day, and take 10 minutes upon another occasion. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill which is now the unfinished business will ask the Senate to proceed with it and if possible pass the bill this evening.

DISCOUNT OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator in charge of the unfinished business is not going on with it to-night, I will move an executive session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withhold his motion for just a moment. There is a bill that has passed the House, a very short bill, that I think we can dispose of by temporarily laying aside the bill in charge of the Senator from New Jersey.

The bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, was unanimously reported by the Finance Committee of the House, unanimously reported without change by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and is very warmly urged by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill is one that permits the banks to cash sight drafts with bills of lading atttached without charging that up as part of the 10 per cent loan to a particular customer. It is really a cash transaction. It has ample security and it is of quite substantial importance that it should be passed without any great amount of delay.

Mr. LODGE. If it is not going to lead to any debate I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it will lead to debate. I do not know of any opposition to it. The only amendment that was offered was by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], who wanted to strike out the provision which required, when the bill of lading covered stock, the stock should be insured. The bill provides that stock must be insured, and he wanted to strike out the limitation as to insurance, but I had a conference with him and I do not think he will insist upon it; I understood he would not.

The only opposition to the bill was in the line of making it more liberal. It was not that it was not liberal as it is, but the Senator from Nevada wanted to make it more liberal; but the Federal Reserve Board felt, and really I think on reflection all felt, that it was not unreasonable to ask that live stock should be insured.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I think I should state that the bill does more than the Senator from Georgia has indicated. It increases the loans that may be extended by the Federal reserve banks. It is true, as the Senator has stated, that it has passed the House and that it was unanimously reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. However, I heard some objection to the bill. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said the other day that he has some objection to it. He is not in the Chamber at the present time, and I do not know but that it would be fair to him to let it go over until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 5, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American Forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

This day, as all others, comes to us out of the unknown to be a day of history. May each one here make his personal record true and clean. Also this day that we mark in time is as much a part of God's eternity as any day we shall ever see. May we lay hold now on eternal life all its promises and all its duties. Vouchsafe to us, O Lord, the sense of real values that in every problem, every choice, we may choose the better part. Not from any cowardly fear of dread judgment and certain retribution, not from cruel, greedy gain, let us act. But lift our motives up, O holy Father, to the level of the truth that Thou hast intrusted us and hast made us to be Thy sons.

We give ourselves to-day not only into Thy keeping from harm, but also into Thy guidance into good. In the deliberations and deeds of this House we invite, we implore Thee, to be present as the chief member and factor. For except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it. Help us, Lord, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Thursday, after the reading of the Journal and the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table he be allowed to address the House for 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas on what subject he desires to address the House?

Mr. BLANTON. On the matter of a report that was filed here in response to a resolution passed by the House awhile ago by the Department of Labor.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman expect to ask any action of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at that time, but to suggest proper action.

Mr. WINGO. Would it not be better to wait until there is some proposition before the House and it is ready to act?

Mr. BLANTON. I will have some proposition at that time.

Mr. WINGO. Has it been considered by any committee of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. WINGO. Then would it not be better to have it go to a committee first and then come to the House next?

Mr. BLANTON. It relates to the passage of two different resolutions by the House on the same subject, which probably I would not get time to discuss.

Mr. WINGO. Many of us have important matters which we would like to discuss. I would like to get an hour myself. I have refrained from asking permission to do so because I have felt that we ought to clean up the business of the House. We have a Private Calendar here, and claims unobjected to have been on that calendar, one of them for four years. I shall not object if the leaders on both sides do not.

Mr. BLANTON. It will be asked that the House meet earlier on that day; so it will not waste time.

Mr. WINGO. It will waste time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns next Wednesday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock Thursday morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns next Wednesday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Thursday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, is that the date on which the gentleman from Texas is to speak?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said some time ago that he was opposed to giving this unanimous consent for debate by gentlemen at a future date. I asked his attention to it this morning. I did not do it a moment ago when my colleague asked for unanimous consent. Hereafter, when the same requests are made by other gentlemen of the House, I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is going to be estopped from objecting.

Mr. MONDELL. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the request I have just made will provide for the meeting of the House at an hour earlier than ordinary, and that therefore the ordinary time for business will not be curtailed by reason of the address which the gentleman from Texas is to make.

Mr. GARNER. Then, if I understand the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL. Now, furthermore, the "gentleman from Wyoming" wants to be consistent. I objected when the gentleman from Texas made his request yesterday to address the House on Tuesday because we expect on Tuesday to bring up the war-risk insurance bill, a bill to amend the war-risk act. That will take all day. There should be nothing preceding that business. Therefore, for the time being, I had to object. Now, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] asked for time in advance to discuss the Battle of the Marne. I did not feel as though I ought to object with regard to that request, and having refrained from objecting in that case to a request made on this side, I did not feel I ought to object to a request made on the other side. But the gentleman from Texas understands my position generally, and that is that I do not think it is wise from the viewpoint of the Congress generally to arrange for speeches in advance unless we have a clear notion of what the business of the House is to be and whether or no those speeches will interfere with the business that is to come up.

Mr. GARNER. Let us see if the gentleman is entirely consistent. As I understand it, hereafter if a gentleman desires 40 minutes or even an hour to discuss a subject, all he has to do is to ask unanimous consent and it is given to him, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] immediately makes the request that when the House adjourns the day previous to the making of the speech that it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock, and that therefore it does not interfere with public business?

Mr. MONDELL. That does not follow at all. There are times when the business that is to come before the House is of such a character that it will not be seriously interfered with by speeches arranged for in advance. The gentleman understands that. And there are times when arranging in advance for these set speeches would seriously interfere with important business.

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman in that connection this question——

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, judgment and discretion have to be used in these matters.

Mr. GARNER. What I am complaining about is this discretion. We ought to have some rule by which we shall be governed, and we ought to adhere to that rule, both on that side of the House and on this side. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming would meet at 12 o'clock on Thursday next to transact important business, but if a Member gets up and secures unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes, then the gentleman moves that when the House adjourns on the day previous it meet at 11 o'clock on the following day, and the gentleman says that thereby we do not interfere with the important business that he speaks of.

Mr. ASWELL. And the chances are that the time will be taken up largely by other gentlemen who have not secured unanimous consent to speak.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up the Private Calendar to-day, this being Private Calendar day?

Mr. MONDELL. It is. I intend to ask unanimous consent to take up bills on the Private Calendar that are not objected to.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, why limit it to those. Why not spend at least one day on the Private Calendar? I have been in Congress now six years, and never have we considered bills on the Private Calendar except under unanimous-consent limitations. We have considered such bills as are not objected to, but frequently gentlemen get offended because their bills are not taken care of, and therefore all bills go off. I know of bills on the Private Calendar that nobody objected to, and yet the gentleman knows that on every occasion when we consider bills on the Private Calendar not objected to by anybody somebody gets impatient or indignant, and that kills the whole day. Why not devote a whole day to the Private Calendar and let bills be taken up on their merits?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman has the right to object when I make such a request, and I would have no disposition to quarrel with him if he does.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, I defer to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. My belief is that the House ought to dispose of bills on the Private Calendar as speedily as it can be done. It is not a good rule to allow bills to remain indefinitely on the Private Calendar, and my hope is that we may take up the Private Calendar at the beginning in the near future and go right through it. But it has been suggested by a number of gentlemen that we would probably make better progress to-day if we took up bills that are unobjected to.

Mr. WINGO. That is always the suggestion.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if the entire day has not been consumed with bills unobjected to, I think we then should go to the bills in their regular order and dispose of them as we reach them.

Mr. WINGO. May I suggest this to the gentleman, that there is a very broad public policy underlying the necessity of considering private bills. My attention was directed to a case, not in my own district, where an Army post needed certain Army supplies immediately one day, and the Army officer had no authority to take those particular supplies, and he suggested to a gentleman having them available within a mile of the post to let him have them and then make a claim against the Government. The gentleman said, "Unfortunately, my family has had a claim pending in Congress on the Private Calendar for years, although there is no objection to it, and it has failed to receive consideration, and a claim against the Federal Government is of uncertain value." Now, from the way we have treated these private claims I could not blame that gentleman, and the gentleman from Wyoming could not.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman that the Congress has not treated these claimants fairly in connection with private claims, in my judgment. Without attempting to criticize or thinking of criticizing anyone, I think Congress has not treated these claimants fairly, and it is my hope that we shall, as speedily as possible, take up bills on the Private Calendar in their order and dispose of them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why not now?

Mr. MONDELL. My opinion is that for to-day we shall make better headway and more progress if we first take up the bills that are not objected to.

Mr. WINGO. Why does the gentleman think that? That suggestion is always made. Why does not the gentleman move to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The reason, I presume, is that there are several bills on that calendar against which in the past there have been filed minority reports and against which there will be a fight.

Mr. WINGO. They can get consideration, just as other bills, and the views of the minority, if approved, will cause the defeat of the bill. No man ought to hold up the legislation of the country simply because he disagrees with the other 434 Members of the House.

Mr. HICKS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that when the House adjourns on Wednesday next it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Thursday?

There was no objection.

WAR RISK INSURANCE BUREAU.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from R. G. Cholmeley-Jones, the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which is an answer to a speech that I made on last Wednesday, August 27. I think it but fair to the bureau that this letter should go in, following my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the head of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. On what subject?

The SPEAKER. In answer to the speech which the gentleman from Iowa made in the House——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Calling the attention of the country to the shortcomings and delinquencies of the bureau.

Mr. GARD. Will it be of benefit to the House?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes. I think so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 28, 1919.

Hon. C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is now 11 o'clock p. m., and I have just finished another very busy day in my efforts to improve the service of the bureau. I do not want the day to close without having communicated with you regarding your comments on the floor of the House on Tuesday, the 26th instant, as recorded in the Wednesday, August 27, issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is certainly a fact that a very large number of people have had reason to be discouraged on account of the apparent lack of service rendered by the bureau.

I have had charge of the affairs of the bureau only since May 19, which was shortly after my return from the A. E. F. It is not necessary for me to defend the affairs of the bureau before that date. I feel it an injustice, however, to all those in the bureau, including the youngest clerk, not to say that it is the amazement of all those who have made a study of the bureau and its operations at any time from its earliest days to the present time, that the bureau has accomplished so much in such a comparatively short time in view of its many handicaps.

Few people realize the full scope of the war-risk insurance act, and little do they appreciate that within the Bureau of War Risk Insurance there are four of the largest businesses of their kind the world has ever known. For instance:

First. A marine and seamen's insurance company, doing a total business of $2,389,541,525, with premiums collected amounting to $46,849,377.19, having issued 33,365 policies and claims paid to the extent of $23,970,296, showing a total surplus over expenses of $17,500,534.

Second. A stupendous banking business in the Allotment and Allowance Division, handling 4,391,356 applications, and making an expenditure during the period of a year and a half of $508,000,000.

Third. An employers' liability company in the Compensation and Claims Division, already paying claims to the extent of $1,652,279 per month, and having paid claims for burial expenses to the extent of $1,645,225.

Fourth. The largest insurance company in the world, having written during the period of a year and a half 4,539,048 individual policies representing a total amount of insurance in force of $39,669,198,000, with premiums collected between October 7, 1917, and January 1, 1919, of approximately $200,000,000, and with claims payable to the extent of $1,010,265,711.

It is very true, indeed, that the only thing that appeals especially to those seeking life insurance is the promptness with which private life insurance companies settle their losses.

On August 22, 1919, the bureau had received 123,140 insurance claims, which includes both death and total disability claims. Of the 123,140 claims, 112,220 have been completed, of which 111,622 are active and 597 have been closed. There have been 1,817 disallowed, and there are to-day 9,103 claims pending, most of which represent payments to be made to beneficiaries living in foreign countries, and owing to many conditions over which the bureau has no control, such as countries inaccessible to mail, proper address of beneficiary not known, condition of foreign mail, etc.

At the present time the bureau has no authority for the establishment of branch offices or representation of any kind within a State for the purpose of handling war-risk insurance matters within the State. Our entire contract with the discharged soldier, sailor, and marine in regard to his war-risk insurance is by correspondence. This method of rendering service to these ex-service men is entirely inadequate and unsatisfactory. Nearly 30 per cent of the communications which we address to these men are returned to the bureau because of changed addresses. This represents a great loss of time and money, and results in much dissatisfaction. We have called upon all of the volunteer agencies, including the American Legion, Veterans of the World War, American Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., Knights of Columbus, Jewish Welfare Board, War Camp Community Service, and many other organizations to cooperate with the bureau in reaching the discharged men, and in the distribution of rate books, descriptive folders, circulars, and some posters. The cooperation given by these volunteer agencies has been of inestimable value. What the bureau would have done without it I hate to think, and yet I get scores and scores of letters from people saying, "Why don't you get some of the volunteer agencies to help you with the war-risk problems?"

I am thoroughly convinced, and already it has been recommended to Congress, that an appropriation be allowed the bureau for a constructive campaign of advertising. I do not mean by this an extravagant expenditure of money, but a well-planned campaign, including the use of country newspapers, State and farm papers, the foreign-language newspapers, magazines, and a few billboards and posters properly placed.

During the war the various owners of all advertising media gave their space generously to the Government without cost. But this is a thing of the past, and no longer is it possible to secure free contributions of advertising.

There are many things which have affected the continuance of war-risk insurance on the part of the service men. The lesser influence, even though it may be great in itself, is the apparent neglect of the bureau to respond with sufficient promptness to communications addressed to it regarding insurance matters.

The greatest single factor is that it takes some time for a man who has been discharged to get his bearings and be ready or able to attend to such matters as paying insurance premiums.

The war-risk term insurance contract was a most satisfactory form of insurance for the soldiers during their active service, and I believe it was accepted as such by the large majority.

Section 404 of the war-risk insurance act reads, in part, as follows:

"Not later than five years after the date of termination of the war as declared by proclamation of the President of the United States the term insurance shall be converted without medical examination into such form or forms of insurance as may be prescribed by regulations and as the insured may request.

"Regulations shall provide for the right to convert into ordinary life, 20-payment life, endowment maturing at age 62, and into other usual forms of insurance."

By reason of this soldiers, sailors, and marines have been led to believe that in converting their insurance from the term contracts into the new forms of Government policies they will be able to secure "usual forms of insurance * * * as may be prescribed by regulations and as the insured may request."

At the present time if an ex-service man, age 20 years, converts his $10,000 term insurance contract into 20-year endowment and pays an annual premium of $391 and dies in the eleventh month of the 20 years, his beneficiaries receive $57.50 a month for 20 years.

If an ex-service man converts a thousand-dollar term insurance contract into a thousand-dollar ordinary life policy at the age of 21, he pays an annual premium of $13.82, and if he should die at any time, no matter how many premiums he may have paid, his beneficiary or beneficiaries within the permitted class would receive $5.75 per month for 20 years—approximately a dollar a week—hardly enough for a square meal.

The premiums on all these policies are somewhat less than those on policies secured from private companies, because of the fact that the Government pays all administrative and overhead costs. It is to be remembered that the administrative cost per insured is not very great, and the Government policy averages from approximately 5 to 20 per cent less than the premium rate at which policies can be secured from the private companies, but a similar contract issued by private companies would not include the feature of the policy becoming mature and payable to the insured in monthly installments during his lifetime in case of his total and permanent disability from any cause whatsoever.

When a man is discharged from the service and is encouraged to convert his insurance and is advised of the new rates, and when he is told also of the conditions of the new Government contract, which restricts him as to whom he may name as his beneficiary and restricts also the payment of the policy to the beneficiary, he laughs. He is no longer in the service, and since he is buying insurance solely on the basis of its usefulness, he is discouraged from buying a contract in which there are so many restrictions.

In my opinion the Government insurance contract should at least be as liberal as those issued by private companies. The ex-service men are demanding that at maturity, by death or otherwise, the face value of the policy be paid either to the insured or to the beneficiary in a lump sum. They believe this to be their right, and without it they flatly refuse to buy the insurance. This consideration alone has discouraged many men from continuing their insurance, and has encouraged them to purchase their insurance protection from private companies. Since the men are required to pay a premium almost as great as that levied by private companies, they insist that the Government contract shall be at least as liberal as the private contract. They feel that by reason of their military or naval service during the recent emergency they would prefer to hold their Government contracts for sentimental and other reasons, but these reasons are not sufficiently strong to make them purchase a contract which is obviously less attractive and possibly much less useful than one obtainable from private companies.

Under authority of war-risk Treasury decision No. 47, all those holding war-risk term contracts are allowed 18 months from the date of discharge in which to reinstate their war-risk term insurance without the payment of back premiums. Therefore if a man has not paid a premium for several months after his discharge it is possible for him to pick up his insurance as soon as he is ready to do so without being charged for back premiums, since during the period of lapsation he has had no insurance protection, and the Government has been under no obligation whatsoever.

There is a bill now before the House, H. R. 8778, which if approved by Congress will materially help in overcoming many of these obstacles.

The bureau, through the Secretary of the Treasury, has also presented to Congress a deficiency appropriation for 1919–20 which includes authorization for the establishment of State representation and for a constructive campaign of advertising.

If this is allowed it will make it possible for the bureau to very materially improve its service to all those who have a right to insist that a proper service shall be rendered.

Your remarks would indicate that the rates of premium were fixed by the bureau. This is not so, nor have we the power to do so. The premium rates are fixed by the war-risk insurance act.

I appreciate very much indeed your constructive criticisms, and I can assure you that every effort is being exercised to put the bureau on an efficient basis and to conduct our affairs as Congress desires that they shall be conducted.

If you or any individual Member or committee of Congress shall visit this bureau, I can assure you a most hearty welcome. This is no one man's job, but it is one of those instances where many who are equally concerned should lend their constructive cooperation in order to make certain that this bureau—one of the most stupendous undertakings of the Government—shall succeed in the interest of those millions of people who are affected by its operations, and so that the countries of the world may for all time respect this legislation as the wisest and most useful ever created for its people by any nation.

Respectfully, yours,

R. G. CHOLMELEY-JONES, Director.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 100. Joint resolution making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act as amended by the act approved September 7, 1918.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States has called or is about to call a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture for the purpose of discussing questions relating to these great interests as affecting each other and the public.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States indorses the action of the President in calling such conference, and pledges to him its earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States—in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

CONTROL OF PRICES AND INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions adopted by the farmers of my home county, Murray County, Tenn., with reference to legislation to control prices in times of peace and on industrial conditions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD resolutions adopted in his home county relative to present industrial conditions. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, and I do not want to object, the gentleman from Tennessee knows that we all receive a great many resolutions like that. If the gentleman from Wyoming permits one of us to print any resolution, all would be compelled to do it. I wrote two letters this morning declining to put resolutions in the RECORD, asked for by constituents, stating that the RECORD was a record of the proceedings of the House. Suppose to-day these resolutions go in and they pick up the RECORD, they will say why did you not print our resolutions? We ought to assume some responsibility.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has referred to my attitude. The gentleman from Wyoming has some responsibilities here, as has also the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. I think that we have perhaps enough responsibility without looking for trouble. I have not set myself up as a guardian of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have very decided views in regard to that matter. But I do not think I should say as majority floor leader what should go into the RECORD. I think the membership of the House should determine that. I shall exercise my rights as a Member of the House in that regard and I hope gentlemen on both sides will take a sufficiently lively interest in the RECORD to preserve it as a record of the proceedings, and that they will object as their judgment dictates to inserting in the RECORD matters that have nothing to do with our proceedings, but I do not believe that I should be the official or unofficial censor of the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] ought to take the responsibility. They have got the honor, they are the leaders of the respective sides of the House, and I think they ought to take the responsibility or the odium, whatever it may be, of taking care of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and other things necessary to object to. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there ought to be anything in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD except a reasonable record of the proceedings of the House. At one time, after I first came here, I was opposed to the extension of remarks and printing speeches in the RECORD never delivered; but I finally came to the conclusion that I would rather they would put them in the RECORD than be compelled to listen to them. [Laughter and applause.] I got to digging around and found out two or three things that are of value, especially to new Members. Some of the best speeches that were ever printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Members of the House were not delivered here at all. I think one of the greatest speeches ever made from the foundation of the Government was Carlisle's speech in favor of the double standard of money. Nobody ever answered it, because it could not be answered; but he came nearer answering it himself than anybody ever did. He sat down in cold blood under one of these blanket leaves to print—never even addressed the Speaker—and wrote that speech in his library. I advise everybody to read it as a fine piece of parliamentary oratory.

Now, I have seen this tried several times. I have heard men, time and again, when somebody objected to what they wanted to do, announce that there would be no more unanimous consents given while they were in the House. As long as they kept mad, which was usually about the rest of the day, they carried it out; but after that they got in good humor, and the same old thing happened over again. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Texas has as much right to object as the gentleman from Wyoming or myself. When a man thinks that matter is offered that ought not to go in the RECORD he ought to object.

The other day the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES] got three long telegrams inserted in the RECORD, nothing but circular letters—no one knew what was in them, and they thought it might be something important; but it turned out that they were of no importance whatever. So a Member may hesitate from preventing a Member from putting matter into the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Some time ago I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to give notice that unless he and the gentleman from Missouri were notified in relation to unanimous-consent matters they were going to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If that rule is adhered to, and I have no objections to it, then I assume, and I think every Member of this House will assume, that the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Wyoming have been consulted, and therefore given indorsement to whatever unanimous consent is asked, or else under that arrangement and understanding if a gentleman arises and asks unanimous consent I think it is the duty of the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from Wyoming to say, "I have not been consulted about this, and therefore I must object for the present." Nobody knows whether the gentleman from Wyoming or the gentleman from Missouri has been consulted. I take it for granted that they have been consulted.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to keep the record straight; the gentleman from Texas unintentionally has misquoted me. The statement I made to which he refers was to the effect that when unanimous consent was to be asked with regard to some matter of importance, having to do with the procedure and business of the House, I thought the gentleman proposing to make the request ought to let me and the gentleman from Missouri know in advance that he was going to make the request. I did not have in mind requests for matters to go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Those have nothing to do with the procedure of the House. They are matters that are to be controlled by the judgment of the membership of the House. It is not for me to say what should or should not go into the RECORD. That is a pretty close question at times, and I do not care to assume the entire responsibility of passing upon it. But when a Member proposes to ask for a change of reference of a bill, or unanimous consent for some legislative procedure in the House, I think I should know about it in advance and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] should know about it in advance, in order that we may be understood to be informed in order that we may inquire if other Members interested have been informed, and that we may assist the Member making the request if it is a proper request. But my suggestion had no reference to corrections of the RECORD or insertions in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. PADGETT. Can we not dispose of my request first?

The SPEAKER. A question of personal privilege is always in order. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. BOIES. With regard to the statement made by the honorable ex-Speaker of this House——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that raises a question of privilege.

Mr. BOIES. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. There is already a request pending for unanimous consent. The Chair can not consider another one until the first one is disposed of. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the question of the high cost of living is a very vital and important one which the people of the country at large are discussing and in which they as well as the Members of the Congress are interested. It is a question that deserves and should receive the best thought and the best attention of all of us, not from a partisan but from as wise and patriotic a standpoint as possible. Various suggestions are offered, legislation and so forth, as a remedy. The other day the farmers in Maury County, Tenn., in my home town of Columbia, adopted some resolutions expressing their view that legislation was not the cure for this difficulty, expressing themselves as opposed to restrictive legislation fixing prices in times of peace, and urging that there should be increased production, and that there should be increased labor, and suggesting that the solution of this question depended upon the great laws of economics—the more work the more pay; the less work the less pay—and that more production would serve to relieve this state of high prices and abnormal conditions. I ask, Mr. Speaker, to insert in the RECORD a newspaper article giving an account of this meeting and setting forth these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

FARMERS OPPOSE FOOD CONTROL IN TIMES OF PEACE—ONLY REMEDY FOR COST OF LIVING LIES IN INCREASING PRODUCTION, NOT IN MORE LEGISLATION—PACKERS DECLARED TO BE NECESSARY TO PROSPERITY OF PRODUCERS AND COLD STORAGE ESSENTIAL TO MARKETING OF THEIR PRODUCTS.

At a well-attended mass meeting of the farmers of Maury County, in response to the call of Acting President Miles Murphy, of the Farmers' Society, on Monday afternoon, resolutions were adopted opposing legislation that would continue regulations and restrictions imposed upon business during the war emergency. The resolutions also opposed efforts to destroy or impair the packers, who are declared to be the marketing end of the live-stock business of the country. It would also be unwise, in the opinion expressed in the resolutions, to unnecessarily hamper the operation of the cold-storage plants or tend to discourage the investment of capital in similar enterprises.

The meeting was called to order by Miles Murphy, who explained its object. The crowd was thoroughly representative of the farmers of the county, nearly every district being represented. In a brief speech J. I. Finney, editor of the Herald, explained the situation that to-day confronts the farmers. He paid a tribute to their devotion during the war, of how they had patriotically submitted to a virtual suspension of the law of supply and demand. Now that the war was over he felt that they were entitled to the fruits of their toil and that they should be permitted to sell in the best market they could with as few artificial restrictions as possible.

T. H. Peebles made a few remarks, which were directed especially at the licensing system. He said everyone was in favor of making the packers and other interests obey the law, but they did not believe in putting them under bureaucratic control.

The following resolutions, offered by J. I. Finney, were then unanimously adopted:

"The farmers of Maury County, called to counsel together on the present industrial and economic crisis in the Nation, give expression to these sentiments:

"Due to the destruction of four years of war, the world is 'short' on all commodities. The ravages of war can not be repaired nor conditions improved through a reduction of labor and a consequent decrease in production. On the contrary, production in mine, in factory, and on the farm must be stimulated in every way possible. This can be done alone by increased labor. In the very dawn of creation the Lord declared unto our common ancestor that man should live in the sweat of his face. That law has not been changed; legislation is powerless to change it. What the world needs now is more work and less legislation; increased production and not expensive investigation by political agents.

"The farmers deny that they have been alone responsible for the increase in the cost of living. They deny that conditions can be improved by destroying or impairing the agencies that have been set up for marketing the products of the farm.

"During the war, under the most adverse conditions, the farmers responded with whole-hearted devotion to the appeal of the Nation for increased production. They did not countenance any lockouts, but, in spite of depleted and demoralized labor supply, they actually increased the Nation's production of food commodities. They willingly and patriotically submitted to regulations that suspended the law of supply and demand and denied them the enjoyment of the full fruits of their toil and efforts. That was their contribution to the saving of the Nation and the winning of the war. Now, however, that the war has been won, largely through the efforts and devotion and self-sacrifice of the farmers, they are unalterably opposed to the continued imposition of socialistic and paternalistic and autocratic regulations on business brought into operation for the winning of the war during times of peace. The emergency which was made the excuse for this legislation having passed, the laws and regulations thereunder should be immediately repealed. We view with alarm the efforts that are persistently being made by a small segment of the population to alter the character of our democratic institutions. We believe that in time of peace there should be as few artificial restrictions placed upon the business as is possible. Therefore we are opposed to the continued operation of the food-control act and its license system or the effort to bring again into operation the machinery of the Food Administration, holding that such legislation is contrary to the genius of our institutions.

"We ask no special favors of Government and are opposed to legislation in the interest of any class. We believe that this system of government, where every man of every class has the same opportunity in life, where the fruits of one's efforts and toil are safeguarded, is the wisest and best system of government yet devised. As genuine Americans, we look with apprehension upon any effort to sovietize any interest or industry. We favor the immediate return of the great transportation systems to their owners under such legislation as will guarantee them against bankruptcy.

"We are opposed to any embargo upon exports, believing in the old American idea that men should be permitted to sell in the best market and buy where they can buy to the best advantage.

"Recognizing the fact that the packing interests furnish the marketing end for the live stock produced on our farms and are a necessary adjunct to live-stock farming, the real basis of all constructive agriculture, we are opposed to any legislation that would impair the efficiency of the packers, hamper unduly their operations, or tend to discourage the investment of capital in similar enterprises. The modern cold-storage plants and refrigeration cars have proven a great blessing not only to the producers but to the consumers. Modern storage methods are the greatest food savers in the world and, at one and the same time, saving food in time of plenty and supplying it in time of scarcity, and, moreover, maintaining a steadier level of prices throughout the seasons for any given commodity. Indiscriminate restrictions on food storage will be nothing less than a calamity to both producers and consumers. Therefore we record our opposition to any legislation or prosecutions that would tend to the destruction or impair the proper functioning of the cold-storage systems of the Nation.

"Believing that the world can be rehabilitized alone through toil and sweat, that relief from present conditions and the saving of our institutions depends altogether upon the increased production of all commodities, we pledge the farmers of this county to do their full share in increasing food commodities and solemnly agree that they will not strike, decrease the hours of their labor, or enter into any combination to decrease production. We call upon all other classes of society to do likewise. Those who strike and paralyze industry are unconsciously contributing to the very conditions against which they protest.

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent by the secretary to the Tennessee delegation in Congress."

After the resolutions were adopted, a large number present voted to reorganize the Maury County Farmers' Society. Miles Murphy was elected president; J. I. Finney, secretary; and A. B. Sowell, vice president. It was agreed to meet on the second Monday of October and thereafter every second Monday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. What is the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The order of business is that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] is entitled to 30 minutes; but by unanimous consent, of course, other business can come before that.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, can we not proceed with the regular order of business of the day?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman demands the regular order. Does he?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order, which is that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] is entitled to address the House for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington yield long enough to allow me to submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MILLER. I shall be glad to do so.

ARMY REVIEW HOLIDAY IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 100, making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, and to consider the same with an amendment substituting the 17th for the 16th.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 100, making the 16th of September a holiday, and to consider the same with an amendment substituting the 17th instead of the 16th. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas arrangements have been made for a grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in the District of Columbia on Tuesday, September 16, 1919; and

Whereas the President, by proclamation, has declared that day a legal holiday in so far as the governmental departments are concerned; and

Whereas the various business houses and other institutions in the District of Columbia have made arrangements to close in order that their employees and others may participate in the celebration; and
Whereas under the laws governing the banking business in the District of Columbia it will be impossible for any of the banks to close on that day without action of Congress declaring the day a legal holiday: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Tuesday, September 16, 1919, being the day of the grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces, is hereby made a legal public holiday in the District of Columbia to all intents and purposes in the same manner as is Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, and the first Monday in September as are now by law public holidays.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolution by inserting in lieu of the words "Tuesday, September 16," wherever they occur in the preamble and the resolution, the words "Wednesday, September 17."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves to substitute, on page 2, line 1, for the word "Tuesday" the word "Wednesday" and for the figures "16" the figures "17."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Why does the gentleman propose that amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. That amendment becomes necessary because the War Department has determined that it will be impossible to have the parade on the 16th as contemplated and has suggested the 17th instead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is the resolution intended to provide a holiday for this year only?

Mr. MONDELL. For this year in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the language sufficiently guard that, when it says that it shall be the same as Christmas, the 1st of January, and so forth?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not read the resolution. I heard it reported, and as I heard it read it seems to safeguard that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not seen the resolution, but from the concluding language of it I doubt whether it is sufficiently guarded to make it a holiday for this year only.

Mr. HASTINGS. It applies only to 1919.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. This is a joint resolution, is it not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Of course it must be signed by the President after it passes the House before it will become a law.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, I am sure, has as thorough a knowledge of the Constitution as I have, and I am sure he can answer his own question as well as I can answer it.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I did not know but that the gentleman knew how it is to be signed, and when it is to be signed, whether the President will be back in time to sign it.

Mr. MONDELL. No. I am assuming that we will do our duty here and leave responsibility with others to do their duty.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman information from the War Department that the troops will be ready to parade on the 17th?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my understanding. Is there any question about it?

Mr. KAHN. I have not heard myself as to whether it is that day. The newspapers have announced that they would parade on the 16th. I understand that now a change has been made.

Mr. MONDELL. To the 17th.

Mr. KAHN. That is simply a newspaper announcement, I understand from the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that that is the settled purpose of the War Department. However, if the House adopts this amendment to the resolution, and the resolution goes back to the Senate, I assume that by that time the Senate will have official communication that the parade is not to be on the 16th.

Mr. KAHN. I quite agree with the gentleman, but I think it wise to find out definitely upon what date the parade will be held, for it may not be until the 18th.

Mr. MONDELL. In which event the Senate can further amend the resolution.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution as amended be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported as it is proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution making Wednesday, September 17, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

Whereas arrangements have been made for a grand view of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in the District of Columbia on Wednesday, September 17, 1919; and
Whereas the President, by proclamation, has declared that day a legal holiday in so far as the governmental departments are concerned; and
Whereas the various business houses and other institutions in the District of Columbia have made arrangements to close in order that their employees and others may participate in the celebration; and
Whereas under the laws governing the banking business in the District of Columbia it will be impossible for any of the banks to close on that day without action of Congress declaring the day a legal holiday: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That Wednesday, September 17, 1919, being the day of the grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces, is hereby made a legal public holiday in the District of Columbia to all intents and purposes in the same manner as is Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, and the first Monday in September as are now by law public holidays.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I first yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Inasmuch as this matter is now in such a muddle, why not withdraw the request and hold it for three or four hours?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as my understanding goes, there is no muddle. I can not say that the 17th has been absolutely determined upon, but that is my information, and I have heard no suggestion to the contrary. Until the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] raised that question, I assumed there was no question in regard to it, but, of course, I have had no official communication.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the gentleman get official communication?

Mr. MONDELL. I made some inquiries, but up to date I have not been able to secure official information. I have no objection to the matter going over, although I think that there is no question about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the phraseology of the resolution make the 17th of September a permanent legal holiday?

Mr. MONDELL. It does not, in my opinion; it clearly does not.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I notice that the second "whereas" makes an assertion with regard to the President's proclamation. It was written for the 16th, and it recites the fact that the President has, by proclamation, made that day a legal holiday. That is the fact. If we change the date to September 17 and then say that the President has by proclamation made that day a legal holiday, that will not be the fact.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the "whereas" is in no wise controlling. It is simply a recitation. It may or may not recite the fact.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; and I merely wanted to call attention to that fact.

Mr. MONDELL. The resolution itself is controlling.

Mr. TEMPLE. The statement is made, nevertheless, in the preamble that the President has announced the 17th——

Mr. MONDELL. No; the 16th.

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, no. If the amendment is agreed to, then the statement will be that the proclamation is for the 17th, when, as a matter of fact, the President's proclamation is for the 16th and has already been issued.

Mr. GARNER. Will that make two legal holidays?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I think the whereases ought to be stricken out of the resolution entirely. They have no proper place in it, and when I get the floor I am going to move to strike out all of the whereases.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois will be in order after the House has passed on the resolution.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further remark?

Mr. MONDELL. It is entirely proper to make that motion.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. The fact is that the President has made one legal holiday by his proclamation, and if we make another there will be two legal holidays, and we can not repeal a proclamation issued by the President.

Mr. MONDELL. But the President can not by proclamation declare a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TEMPLE. He can not, but he has done it.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; he has made certain provisions so far as he has authority with regard to holiday privileges for the employees of the Government. The President can modify that.

Mr. GARNER. If the President does not modify it, then the Government employees of the District of Columbia will have two holidays. They will have one by act of Congress and another by proclamation of the President.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know just how we can remedy that situation, but I assume that the President will remedy it.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JUUL. I wish to ask the Speaker if it is in order now to move that action upon this resolution be postponed until immediately before adjournment to-day in order to furnish the gentleman from Wyoming an opportunity to secure official information upon the subject on which we are to vote?

The SPEAKER. That is in order——

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will withhold——

The SPEAKER. It is in order after the gentleman from Wyoming has ceased debate and yielded the floor.

Mr. JUUL. I wish the Speaker would rule upon my question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in this matter except the interest of the House and the country. There seems to be a spirit of criticism here with regard to it. There is not any question but what the parade is going to be on the 17th day of September unless something extraordinary occurs, and it occurs to me that it would be well to have this matter settled. At the proper time I intended to move to strike out the preamble. I have no desire to press the matter if gentlemen are——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If gentlemen are critical about it; but no harm will be done. Allow me to suggest that if we amend the resolution and it goes back to the Senate and there shall be another change of date——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wyoming what harm can come from letting this resolution go over until shortly before adjournment to-day?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, in deference to gentlemen who are very critical about this matter I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request for the present consideration of the resolution. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE BATTLE OF THE MARNE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House [applause], I thank you for the time allowed to-day. I shall undertake to give the elements of the Battle of the Marne.

This, the 5th day of September, is Marne Day in France, celebrated in honor and in memory of the triumph of the French armies in early September of 1914. The 5th of September, 1914, marked the termination of the retreat of the French and British Armies down from Belgium and the taking of the great offensive, or counteroffensive, which terminated in the victory I have described. The following general order was issued on that date by Field Marshal Joffre, Generalissimo of the French Armies:

> At the moment when a battle on which depends the welfare of the country is about to begin I have to remind all ranks that the time for looking back is past. Every effort must be made to attack the enemy and hurl him back. Troops which find advance impossible must stand their ground at all costs and die rather than give way. This is the moment when no faltering will be tolerated.

The following order was found after the battle amongst the papers of Gen. von Tscheppe, commander of the Eighth Corps, which probably is a copy of the general orders issued by the German General Staff and adapted to the several corps:

> The object of our long and arduous marches has been achieved. The main French forces, after a protracted retreat, have been forced to accept battle. The great decision is unquestionably at hand. To-morrow, therefore, the whole German Army, as well as our own corps, will be engaged everywhere on the line Paris–Verdun. To save the welfare and honor of Germany I expect every officer and man, notwithstanding the hard and heroic fighting of these last days, to do his duty unswervingly and to the last breath. Everything depends on the result of to-morrow.

The test of battle was then mutually offered and accepted. The great contest was opened and at hand. Marshal Joffre had chosen his battle fields on the east and west front. The respective strategists were pitted one against the other, the opposing armies placed, and the forces arranged man to man. Never before and certainly never since the days of Gettysburg has a beaten, war-worn army, thought by the enemy to be helpless, suddenly turned and fought with such desperation. The order was "to die rather than give way," and the French withstood and passed the test. [Applause.] Sacrifice was freely offered and greedily accepted.

THE NAME OF THE BATTLE.

I have spoken of the Battle of the Marne in the singular. That is not correct. It would carry the idea that this supreme struggle was a single, detached, isolated engagement. Such is not the case. Rather what we call the Battle of the Marne was a series of battles, fought in sequence on a front extending from Nancy on the Alsace-Lorraine frontier, northeast to Verdun, around the Verdun sector, then on an arc swinging to the west and sagging to the south until near the west end, when it took a turn to the northwest, ending fairly on the outskirts of Paris—a distance of approximately 190 miles. At least five distinct and separate battles were within the series, all arranged, while not in strict sequence, at least according to a general plan, interdependent, and so timed as to make a complete, connected, orderly campaign.

A far better name would be the Battles of the Marne or the Campaign of the Marne.

MAGNITUDE AND CONCEPTION.

Never before and probably never again will such a master campaign be fought. Certainly not if the human mind, elevated by the reasoning powers, can conceive and realize the uselessness of war. The development of the human understanding is the only hope, and slow development it is. Wars have always been and probably always will be. Struggle as we may, philosophize as we will, examine and discuss until we grow old and tottering, think and reflect, but still the human mind seems to dwell and linger then embrace that form of coercion which we call force of which war is the very essence.

Aside from the hope of prohibiting a duplication of this titanic struggle of the Marne by the application of a universally accepted humane philosophy which shall change human nature, there is a limit to the size of everything that comes or goes or is brought into motion. There is a limit to the speed, size, and endurance of all finite things. There is a limit to the very terror of the elements. The fury of the storm is gauged by a law which we do not understand though we know it exists. There is a limit to the number of men involved in connected and definite purpose. There is a limit to the directing power as well as to the power or force or substance which responds. For my part I can scarcely conceive of any one mind directing the maneuvering, the coordination, the harmonious relation in action of such vast machinery until it works with a ponderous unity of purpose amid the excitement and confusion of battle. Yet such came, such was, whether we conceive it or not, whether we grasp it or whether we understand it.

The Battles of the Marne were fought with the eyes of the world attempting to see and the ears of the universe attempting to hear. The world understood that the progress of mankind had come to one of its turning points—to the crossways like Ajax of old—and stood dependent and helpless on the turn of the tides of these battles. Should our institutions and our civilization, as we know them, continue in the affairs of nations and of men, or should a new and strange philosophy be the basis of the future of the race? This was the question awaiting decision at the Marne.

Hence I say the Battles of the Marne, the decision reached upon and through them, was not only epochal, it was more than that, it was destiny.

There is another strange and not wholly unexpected fact connected with this campaign, and that is that it should have been brought so early in a war which dragged its course out over a period of four years and four months.

Germany declared war against France on August 3, 1914, and invaded Belgium on the 4th. Within 30 days from that date the battles of the Marne were in full swing, and in five weeks the tricolor of France was waving in triumph from Paris to Nancy. The world at first stunned and stoical came back to itself and began to think and plan with method and purpose. France had fought like a tigress suddenly set upon by an enemy, superior in strength and with the advantage of the force of spring. She fought what was in front of her, fought for her life, striking at everything within distance, not dazed but desperate, and with the blind fury of despair. It was her only chance, her chance for life. Thirty days from a state of peace to the greatest battle and the greatest victory in human history is the record of France in what her people call "the awful year of 1914." Who will deny to her the full honor which is hers? Who will not rejoice with her on Marne Day?

Before going into the master strategies, much less those which the exigencies of the campaign brought forth, it is not only proper but of primary interest to trace the battle front and, if possible, see how the very peculiar line came to be established.

THE PECULIAR-SHAPED FRONT.

The battle front came on from the combination of the peculiarly established national frontier, the presence of fortresses, the topography of the country, and the strategies employed. This latter was the only variable element in the great struggle, and necessarily was the result of the movement of the respective armies before and during the series of engagements.

To begin with, let us examine the two parts of the eastern frontier of France—first, from Luxemburg south to the Swiss frontier, and second, from Luxemburg north to the British Channel. For the purpose of military defense France had so divided it. To the south there had been four great fortresses erected or reconstructed since the war of 1870, all with infinite care and ability and at great cost. These fortifications were stationary in character, and of the Brailmont or modified Brailmont type, and all so linked up and interlocked as to make one of the strongest, if not the strongest, fortified frontier in Europe. A strange gap in this line existed south of the fortress of Toul, the reason for which I have never heard explained, though I suspect it formed part of some subtle French strategy. The city of Nancy was an open city and unfortified under the terms of the convention of Frankfort.

Verdun, Toul, Epinal, and Belfort, with their respective supporting rings, covered the frontier fairly from Luxemburg to Switzerland, save some isolated fortresses in the foothills as the rugged Swiss frontier is approached. Verdun is approximately 30 miles west of the strongly fortified German city of Metz and has east and west and north and south railway connections. Toul likewise has an east and west railway line running into Germany and west with connections into Paris. Also one line running north and south fairly following the course of the frontier. Epinal and Belfort and the southern isolated fortresses have only the north and south railway lines. The substantial city of Nancy is approximately east of the fortress of Toul. These railway lines running into Germany, thence to the military base at Metz and the industrial cities of Mulhausen, Colmar, and Strassburg, became a vital element of both German and French strategy.

THE GRAND COURONNÉ DE NANCY.

There is a strange topographical feature of the terrain west and northwest of Nancy consisting of a long series of hills lying between the Seille and the Moselle Rivers. This succession of hills, while not forming a continuous ridge, is of great strategic importance, affording, together with the deep cut of the Moselle, military defensive positions of great strength. This strange formation is some 15 miles in length. Open fortifications were constructed along the eminence. This locality is known generally as the Grand Couronné de Nancy. The topography is such that there are four dominating positions. The Beacon of Xon, the most northern, thence the Heights of Mousson, then to the south and in order are the plateaus of St. Genevieve and Amance.

The boundary line between France and Germany is purely arbitrary as distinguished from any natural boundary line. This Grand Couronné is well to the west of the boundary line, and forms the key to the great system of French fortifications. There is nothing to the east or on the German side to offset these dominating positions. Thus it will be seen that nature has assisted man, or rather the reverse, in creating a strong defensive position on the German frontier. The weakest point is the northern end of the Grand Couronné, between the hills and the outlying southern supporting forts of Verdun.

Since the construction of this chain of fortresses and forts it has been considered by French engineers that the direct frontier leading into Germany was secure. The French have always discounted the value of heavy ordnance, and instead pinned their faith to the lighter, more mobile, quick-firing fieldpiece. They seem to have practically, if not entirely, overlooked the great advantage of high explosives, as well as the powerful heavy mobile ordnance, designed and adapted to the use of these high explosives. The French are open field fighters. Such is their history. It suits the French temperament, hence the adoption of that type of ordnance most useful in the open field operations. The wonderful Scoda howitzer, using the high explosives, developed and perfected by the Austrian general staff, together with the machinery by which indirect firing is reduced to the accuracy of direct firing, appears to have been likewise overlooked, or its use and adaptability discounted. The French argument was that heavy ordnance reduced the mobility of an army, and that mobility was of prime importance in fieldwork, and further, that any possible campaign with the Germans would in all probability be a sudden blow which could be most effectively met by a thorough mobile army. In this they were right, perfectly right, but wrong, absolutely wrong, when the front became stabilized. The French designed the wonderful Schneider or Crusot fieldpiece in various smaller calibers adapted to open fieldwork. The 75-millimeter and the 155-millimeter are the most perfect field guns ever designed, and I may say in passing that these remarkable guns were no small factor in the decision of the Marne. These guns, as well as the tactics and manual of operation, have never been surpassed and probably approach perfection as nearly as a state of perfection is possible of attainment. The two schools of artillery, the German, that of the heavy, ponderous piece, using high explosives indirectly fired, and the French, the light, nimble, rapid-firing piece for use in the open field—each of these schools was right, but the correctness or, rather, the adaptability depended on the character of the campaign. The French had correctly prejudged that any campaign would be a sudden burst; hence mobility of fieldwork was a principle perfectly sound and intensely practical.

But what became of the permanent fortifications when attacked by the high explosives? The answer, the only answer is, the fate of Liege and Namur, and Maubeuge and Verdun, and every experience where immovable fortifications were tried. The irresistible conclusion is that there is no system or design of masonry forts which can withstand the high explosives, and to this end and to this conclusion military engineers of the present and future must adjust themselves. The permanent masonry fortress is obsolete from every point of view and every experience.

The perfection of modern indirect firing of high explosives in land warfare, together with the development of the torpedo in naval warfare, have eliminated the stationary immovable defense as dependable factors of resistance. I will place my faith for the future in the mobile or moving, shifting defense. The experiences of this war have demonstrated beyond doubt that when the range is obtained and the resisting force is located any structure, made or constructed by human hands, is doomed to yield and fall. Two elements alone remain—mother earth and the mobile defense.

Let me now turn to that part north of Luxemburg to the Channel. Verdun, so full of history from the days of the Romans, the heart's pride of Charlemagne and the spot chosen for the division of his realm, so soon—early in 1916—to focus the eyes of the world and to withstand the greatest assaults of which there is history.

To the north of Verdun and until the Belgian frontier is reached there is only one east and west railroad, and that runs into the city of Luxemburg, thence on to the interior of Germany. It must be remembered that Luxemburg is neutral territory under the treaty of London of 1839, hence its limited use for military purposes. Besides, the outer northern rim of Verdun forts cover the country, which by its peculiar topography is illy adapted as an entering zone of a great military force. Along the frontier of neutral Belgium—neutral since the same treaty of London of 1839—there is no system of fortresses, only fortified cities here and there. On this part of the frontier France had thought herself secure by the guarantees of neutrality of Belgium and Luxemburg, and had extended her energy on Verdun and to the south.

As early as 1906 German engineers had surveyed military railroads from the lower Rhine westward to the Belgian frontier. These roads, of no possible industrial use, had actually been completed as early as 1912, builded under the pretext of extensions to the State system. Rails, switches, and all necessaries were in reserve to connect these roads with the Belgian system, all fixed and measured and held in reserve under the innocent representation of reserved stock.

It had become apparent to the French that there was a growing disposition in the German general staff that in the event of war between the countries the invasion of Belgium was possible and that the treaty by which the neutrality of Belgium was guaranteed might be violated. In State circles, however, it was thought that such was impossible, inasmuch as Prussia was one of the individual guarantors of neutrality.

It seems, however, that the prevailing French military opinion was that such preparations as gave color to Belgium's invasion, and thereby an avenue into France, was part of the German strategy to lead France to make great expenditures on the innocent Belgian frontier, and consequently the withdrawing of activity and the lessening of the efficiency of the real hazardous frontier of Germany proper.

The natural place of attack would be through Alsace-Lorraine, with the armies based on Metz and eastward to the cities along the Rhine. Railroad lines had been so constructed as to make this not only possible, but highly probable. Any view of the situation would force this conclusion, and as the years passed, each with its activities, this conclusion was confirmed.

BREACH OF THE TREATY OF 1839.

When the storm broke in July of 1914 it for the first time developed that preparations for the invasion of Belgium were more complete than even the French had anticipated. It was plain now that in the invasion of Belgium the military authorities had cast aside the feeble protest of the civil authorities, especially that of the imperial chancellor. It will be remembered that the imperial chancellor, in his well-known speech of August 4, 1914, to the Reichstag, admitted the breach of neutrality of Belgium when he said:

Gentlemen, this is a breach of international law. It is true that the French Government declared at Brussels that France would respect Belgium's neutrality as long as her adversary respected it. We know, however, that France stood ready for invasion. France could wait. We could not. A French attack on our flank on the lower Rhine might have been disastrous. Thus we were forced to ignore the rightful protests of the Governments of Luxemburg and Belgium. The wrong—I speak openly—the wrong we thereby commit we will try to make good as soon as our military aims have been attained.

He who is menaced as we are, and is fighting for his highest possession, can only consider how he is to hack his way through.

Although it is still maintained by high military authorities in Europe, especially by the eminent Swiss general, Feyler, that the invasion of France through Belgium was a huge military blunder, the advantages are fairly measured in terms greater—far greater—than any other possible point of attack. In doing so, however, we shall be forced to eliminate the political factor of the deliberate breach of the treaty to which she was a party and the direct military consequences.

THE INVASION.

The principal advantages of attacking France through Belgium were:

First. The occupation and subjection of Belgium as a part of the conquest, which was one of the motives of the war.

Second. The early occupation of all northwest France with its great industrial centers and mineral wealth.

Third. The bringing of the channel ports under subsequent domination, thus cutting off England.

Fourth. Affording the opportunity of bringing into France a greater number of troops within a given time, and giving these troops an opportunity to deploy upon an east and west front, in accordance with the plan of strategy determined upon by the German general staff.

Fifth. It avoided breaking through the eastern front with the obvious delay and hazard.

It had been demonstrated at Liege and Namur that the masonry forts, at least those of the Brailmont type, could not withstand the high explosives. Six hours was sufficient in each case to reduce these fortresses to masses of ruins. The brave defense of the Belgians was beaten down together with the French and British resistance in Belgium and France. The German military railways were immediately hooked up with those of Belgium, and four great armies poured into that country and on into France. The startling rapidity with which those armies advanced and the enormous number of men indicated clearly that the German plan of invasion was to be a repetition of that of the war of 1866 with Austria and of 1870 with France—a short decisive campaign, brought about by overwhelming numbers before the enemy had time to mobilize or prepare. No sooner had their armies moved out of Belgium than the master strategy was revealed. They immediately began deploying upon a gigantic front, sweeping southwest and south on a constantly widening front, approximating more and more directly into an east and west line as the front advanced. The line everywhere was advanced with the exception of Maubeuge, which alone held against the advancing tide.

The British and French were overwhelmed in the deluge; beaten, driven back, and all but swallowed up in the onrush of men. It was the mad rush of war to the infinite. As the line advanced it began to spread in a fanlike formation, deploying to the west on a constantly increasing arc, then southwest, sweeping, tearing, crushing, and beating its way.

As the sweep broadened it became apparent that Paris must fall within two weeks, or when the onrushing hordes would reach it. Thousands of people abandoned the city. The government was hastily removed to Bordeaux, as it had been in 1870. Everything gave way before this mad forward crush. The Aisne and the Somme were past, and it truly seemed that there was no power on earth capable of successful resistance. It was a gigantic, encircling, enveloping, crushing, grinding movement on an unheard of and undreamed of scale. The Channel ports, so vital to England—and France, too, for that matter—were left behind. Supplies for the British, coming via these ports, were detoured far around to the west. The second strategic plan, or rather the corollary to the first, was now revealed, and that was that the Channel ports were to be treated simply as geographical points to be returned to and taken later at convenience. This sweep seemed to be on an arc, the pivot of which was Verdun or vicinity, with the marching flank so far extended as to take Paris in the grand sweep.

I may say, in passing, right here that there is no proof by any military writer that Paris was the objective of any German army at the time of the invasion in 1914.

These four armies and their commanders were as follows:

First Army, on the extreme western flank, Gen. von Kluck; Second Army, to the east of the First Army, Gen. von Bülow; Third Army, to the east of the Second Army, Gen. Von Hausen; Fourth Army, to the east of the Third Army, Duke of Wurtemberg. The Fifth Army, under the nominal command of the Crown Prince, came through Luxemburg and occupied the Verdun sector. The rôle of this army was the investment of Verdun. To the south of Verdun and based on Metz was the Sixth Army, under the command of the Crown Prince of Bavaria. The rôle of this army was the holding of Lorraine and the offensive of the east front.

To the south of the Crown Prince of Bavaria lay the Seventh Army, under Gen. von Heerigen. The rôle of this army was the holding of Alsace-Lorraine and the joining in the offensive on the east. It was based on Strasburg and Saarburg. The actual number of men in these two armies is unknown, even to the present day, so far as any statistics I have seen published. It must be remembered that large bodies were left behind to occupy the captured territory. Maubeuge alone detained one full corps. The German Army had been almost constantly engaged since its entrance into Belgium, and thousands of casualties had resulted. However, it is definitely known that at the time there were at least 75 divisions deployed at the front between Verdun and Maeux, the westernmost point of the assuming line of battle. Replacement troops had been constantly arriving, and as the base of supplies was extended more men were detached from the combat troops for the purpose of guarding the lines. We do know at the time of the battle the following assignments to the various armies comprised at least a portion of the combat troops:

PLACING OF THE GERMAN FORCES.

First Army, Gen. von Kluck: Second, Third, Fourth, and Ninth Corps, Fourth Reserve Corps, and a portion of the Eighth Reserve Corps, Second and Fourth Cavalry Divisions and a part of the Third.

Second Army, Gen. von Bülow: Prussian Guard Corps and Seventh and Tenth Reserve Corps, and at least two cavalry divisions, probably the First and Fourth, and the remaining part of the Third.

Third Army, Gen. von Hausen: Twelfth and Nineteenth Corps and Twelfth and Nineteenth Reserve Corps. These were the Saxon troops and probably one division of Saxon troops, the Eighteenth, was included.

Fourth Army, Duke of Wurtemberg: Eighth and Eighteenth Corps and Seventh and Eighteenth Reserve Corps. The Seventeenth Corps probably in its entirety was with this army.

Fifth Army, Crown Prince: Sixth, Thirteenth, and Sixteenth Corps, Fifth and Sixth Reserve Corps with a cavalry division, possibly two divisions, Fifth and Sixth Reserve Corps.

Sixth Army, Crown Prince.

Seventh Army, Gen. von Heerigen.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief interruption here, to state to us what the force of the seven armies amounted to in numbers?

Mr. MILLER. The force of the seven armies in numbers amounted to about 1,450,000 men.

Mr. ROSE. If the gentleman will yield at that point. Since the gentleman has located the German armies, will the gentleman kindly point out the location of the French armies at that particular time on the map?

Mr. MILLER. The French and British forces likewise consisted of seven armies. The British army was opposite No. 1 of the German army. The Fifth Army was opposite No. 2 of the German army. The French Army No. 6 was on the outskirts of Paris under the command of Gen. Maunoury. The British lay to the southeast of that, commanded by Field Marshal French. Then next came the French center under Marshal Foch, designated in all orders as the Ninth French Army, but it occupied the center. On the right of that was the army under Gen. de Cary. Gen. Sarrail had Verdun. Gen. de Castelnau had the Second French Army; Gen. Paul the Third. So you will see the First French Army was really opposite the Seventh German, and vice versa all along the line, except the British was also opposite the First German Army. The Sixth French Army at this time was unknown to the Germans.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman state in that connection the combined number of men in the French armies?

Mr. MILLER. About 900,000. The proportion, so the writers give it, is from five upward to seven and a half and eight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that there had been no proof that Paris was the objective of the German armies.

Mr. MILLER. Perfectly true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman be good enough to state what was the objective?

Mr. MILLER. It was the grand enveloping movement to surround and capture the French and British armies, to envelop and capture them, following the elemental tactics that as long as there is an operating army in the field the military force of the enemy is not broken; and they treated Paris and the channel ports as purely geographical points to be returned to and taken at pleasure because there would be no force to resist.

Strange it is that there are no figures given as to the number of men in the Sixth and Seventh German Armies. However, the most probable troops were the Fourteenth, the Fifteenth, and the Sixteenth Corps, and the First and Second Bavarian Corps. These two were formidable armies, and were massed for the protection of Lorraine and Alsace, and also upon them fell the contemplated forcing of the Grand Couronné. With these armies was also the apparently detached army under Gen. Stranz, which made the sortie out of Metz, swung around south of Thienville, menaced Verdun from the south and the Grand Couronné from the north. These armies, together with the independent command I have spoken of, which aggregated nearly, if not quite, 350,000 men—more men per mile than on any part of the line. The rôle of this very formidable force was to force the Grand Couronné, sweep around to the west and north, and thus form the lower jaw of the pinchers in the grand enveloping movement.

THE GREAT ENVELOPING MOVEMENT.

As the armies swept down from the north and came up into line, it developed that the master German strategy was a gigantic enveloping movement—an enormously increased Sedan of 1870. Verdun seemed to have been the pivot of the two wings or jaws. The first was to swing down from the north and come in from the west in its encircling swing. The second was to break through the eastern front and sweep to the west and north, thus completing the envelopment. Never has military tactics revealed movements on such a gigantic scale. Envelopment is based upon superior numbers—that is the element it must always possess to insure the success of the movement. Superior numbers the Germans were assured of. They knew it, the French knew it, the world knew it. In the downward southern sweep, as it spent its fury, it became more and more uncertain as to the immediate fate of Paris. At one time Von Kluck's western flank was almost due north of the capital, but suddenly he veered to the southeast and passed the Marne well to the east. This movement revealed the same general plan as the passing of the Channel ports—that Paris was likewise to be treated as a geographical point to be returned to and invested at pleasure. The Germans were in their master plan of campaign, which they conceived no subtle strategy of the French could frustrate.

Neither the French nor British fell back within the defenses of Paris.

THE FRONT BECOMES STABILIZED.

The French tactics had been a constant retreat from Belgium, taking the British with them. Resistance was given here and there when opportunity afforded. Meubeuge alone held out. The allied armies crossed the Marne, the Oureq, the Greater and Lesser Mourins, until they reached the ground of their choice, the watershed south of the Marne and north of the Seine. During the entire three weeks the British and French were holding back as best they could this crushing, hammering advance, the French were feverishly, but orderly, assembling their troops and disposing of them according to the plan agreed upon and best adapted to coordination and defense.

It was now in the early days of September, the 2d, that the line became anything like stabilized. The constant retreat, giving where the pressure was strongest, had formed when the stabilization had assumed a definite form a front representing an odd and irregular and most unusual form. This line, generally speaking, swept down from the northeast of Paris to the southeast, then bellying down or sagging south on an ill-defined arc, then raising very marked to the northeast of Verdun, then around Verdun to the southeast, along the frontier of Lorraine and Alsace.

The line formed was not unlike an irregular, horizontally arranged letter "S"—a scythe-shaped line, as Belloc calls it.

THE FRENCH FORCES.

To meet this gigantic enveloping movement the French had brought into use that strategy known as the "mass of maneuver," one element of which is the massing of reserves at unexpected points. The idea of this strategy is to force the line of the enemy to be so extended by one pretext or another until there is a weak point somewhere, then to strike this weak place with the reserves held in position for that purpose, and thus cut the line. Of course, concealing the reserves is a necessary condition and is vital to the strategy. This is an old strategy, so often used by Napoleon, and the Germans had full knowledge of it. They knew it would be attempted, as it was the only strategy which could be employed under the circumstance of such overwhelming numbers. Having knowledge of this French plan and that it would be attempted, makes the subsequent German movements all the more stupid.

The French had brought up a very substantial army, which deployed to the right and left on the enormous front. It must be remembered that this ground, every foot of it, was familiar to every French general and corps commander. It was the scene of Napoleon's great campaign in 1814, just 100 years before it was now to become the battle ground of Europe.

PLACING OF THE FRENCH AND BRITISH ARMIES.

Sixth Army, Gen. Maunoury: Seventh Corps, Forty-fifth Division, Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Reserve Divisions, a division of Moorish troops, and a full division of cavalry, with some additional of Gen. Sordet's.

This is the first of the two groups of the "mass maneuvers." This army came out of Paris and never became visible until Von Kluck in his sudden southeast movement had passed south of the Marne. Its position was facing the right flank of the First German Army and its rôle was to attack and engage the right flank of that army, get well to its rear, and cut its line of communications, and thus force Von Kluck to retreat and bring his forces back north of the Marne. Another element of the strategy was to entice him to deploy to the west, which in turn would force Von Bülow, with the Second Army, to likewise deploy to the west, all with the purpose in view of extending the German front and forming some weak spot in the line upon which the second group of the "mass maneuver" could operate. This was the master strategy of the French.

The British Army, Field Marshal French: Three corps (First, Second, and Third) and one division of cavalry under Gen. Allenby.

This force was greatly depleted by casualties, as it had been for three weeks engaging the German advance. This army lay southeast of Paris and south of the Marne River. The rôle of this army was to attack Gen. von Kluck on the front simultaneously with Gen. Manoury's attack on the right flank and rear.

Fifth Army, Gen. d'Esperey: First, Third, and Eighteenth Corps, Fifty-first and Fifty-third Reserve Divisions, and two divisions of cavalry.

This army was opposite the Second Army, and its rôle was to engage that army while the British and French Sixth Army was to roll up Von Kluck, drive him back, and isolate him.

Ninth Army, Gen. Foch (often called the Seventh Army): Ninth and Eleventh Corps, three Moorish divisions, Fifty-second and Sixtieth Reserves, and the Ninth Cavalry, with additions.

This army occupied the center and was opposite the famous Third Army, or Saxon Army. Its rôle was to take advantage of the extension of the German front and to work the dislocation of the German line. The second group of the "mass maneuver" was placed behind this army, to be used at the opportune moment.

Fourth Army, Gen. de Cary: Second, Twelfth, Seventeenth, and Twenty-second Corps.

This army was opposite the Fourth German Army, and its position in the French line was on the right of the center, and its rôle was to hold the line, protect the right center, and join in the general assault when the second group of the "mass maneuver" was ordered to operate.

Third Army, Gen. Sarrail: Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Corps, First Brigade of the Fifty-fourth Division, three reserve divisions (Fifty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, and Sixty-ninth), and a division of cavalry.

This army was opposite the Fifth German Army and operated in the Verdun sector. Its rôle was the holding of Verdun and Fort Tryon and the northern wing of the eastern front.

Second Army, Gen. de Castelnau.

I am unable to give the designation of the corps and divisions in this army. The army, however, was a formidable one, having the defense of the Grand Couronné de Nancy, and was opposite the German Sixth Army, under the Crown Prince of Bavaria. The celebrated Twentieth Corps formed a part of this army.

First Army, Gen. Pau.

I am likewise unable to give the corps and divisions of this army. It was opposite the Eighth German Army. Its rôle was to defend the eastern front of the Grand Couronné, protect the isolated forts lying to the south, and to close the gap south of Toul.

The First and Second French Armies, together with the troops subsequently shifted elsewhere on the line, had recently been engaged in an offensive at Alsace, had taken Mulhausen and Strassburg, but met with disaster at Morhauge, and had been forced to fall back nearly to the frontier, taking a position in the Grand Couronné and stabilizing the eastern front.

Events were so shaping themselves that the retreat of the British and French armies to the south was about to end. The main French army had been assembled and had taken its position directly in front of the advancing Germans, covering the entire line from the western rim just to the northeast of Paris to Verdun. By the 2d of September the armies were in position, and on the 3d the line assumed a definite and defined course. The last retreat of the British and French was on September 1, and this had placed the First German Army in an extremely difficult position. Here I may say in passing that the oft repeated and common saying that the object of the First German Army was the capture of Paris is wholly and absolutely without foundation. The capture of the capital had never been the objective of the First Army or of any other German army that I know of. By the British and French retreat southeast of Paris the capital was deliberately offered open to attack. The Germans were following the elementary strategy "that as long as there is an open operating army in the field the military power of the enemy is not broken."

The primary purpose of the German Army's invasion was the envelopment and capture of the French field armies. However stupid Von Kluck's movements may have been, he was too wise an officer to consider the occupation of Paris for a minute. By Von Kluck's shunt to the southeast he undoubtedly thought there was no considerable force lying behind the defenses of Paris. He was clearly ignorant of the presence of the French Sixth Army at this very spot. Kluck continued his southeast shunt, following the general plan of enveloping; it also tended to the consolidation of the German line and thus to render the operation of the French second group "mass maneuver" less dangerous. By this move the entire right flank of his army was exposed. However, he took the precaution to leave one army corps behind, thus covering any possible attack of his flank and rear and to keep his line of communication open. Kluck also counted upon the entire British force as being too exhausted and weakened by casualties to be effective. The southeast movement worked the commencement of his undoing. His subsequent retreat north of the Marne was brilliantly executed, but that which followed, consisting of his deploy to the west, was the fatal evolution. It was the universally prevailing opinion amongst all German Army commanders that the French were utterly demoralized, beaten, shattered, ineffective, and without morale. The retreat, especially to the southeast of Paris, thus leaving open the capital, was evidence sufficient to them, and absolutely confirmed them in their position. They accepted it as a truth that the French had continuously given away to avoid battle, and that all that was to be done was to continue the enveloping movement, and the French Army, or what was left of it, would ultimately be caught in the two jaws of the pincers. A German writer by the name of Fendrich, whoever he may be, speaks of Von Kluck's movements as "a plan so wonderful and so full of genius that only in the time to come will mankind grasp its greatness." Every military writer the world over has been undertaking to discover of what this genius consists; on the contrary, it is universally agreed that Von Kluck fell a victim to the cunning French strategy, and that as a commander he was wholly and completely outclassed.

Let us now turn to the eastern front, where the battles of the Marne opened and where the first great event took place.

BATTLES OF THE GRAND COURONNÉ.

I can not agree with some that the battles of the Grand Couronné de Nancy and those fought on the eastern front constituted no part of the battles of the Marne as a campaign. They are clearly a part of the general campaign which found its crux at La Fere Champenoise on the 9th of September. To not so include them is to do violence to every conception of coordination. Indeed, unless what took place on the Grand Couronné had not resulted in the manner that it did the French strategy would have utterly failed and disaster would have befallen the French as surely as the sun would have followed its course.

The whole strategy of the Marne was based upon the French holding the eastern front, the key to which was the Grand Couronné. It is as directly connected as human plans and actions can make, and to me it is astonishing that every person who pretends to have even a fair knowledge does not share in the same conclusions. The great enveloping plan of the Germans was based on the two coordinating movements, perfectly timed. The northern or western arm of the envelopment was to sweep down from the north, turning to east, continuing its encircling movements. This was the first, and simultaneously the formidable armies on the eastern front were to force the Grand Courronne crush in the eastern front and enter upon its western and northern encircling sweep. This is as clear as subsequent action can demonstrate. There is no escape from this conclusion. To my mind there is absolutely no foundation that the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh German Armies were simply to hold a stabilized front. The two German armies were to meet with the French and English, completely surrounded. The eastern front was to be first forced, as the lines of communications to this front were short, while the lines to the western front were constantly being extended. It was the German tactics that when the northern arm had in its encircling movements reached an approximately east and west line the eastern front was to be forced. Following this general plan we find that when Kluck had reached Senelis, which made the German line a little north of due east, the eastern front was attacked in a tremendous assault, and the campaign of the Marne—what the Germans thought was the closing of the drama—was open and on. This was September 1, and the signal for it was Kluck's turn to the southeast, the greatest arc of the circle. Thus the battles open on the eastern front on September 1. They were the first of that series of engagements which the world terms "the Battle of the Marne." When the full story of the campaign is told and the veil of German secrecy, as well as that of the French, is lifted we will find beyond the shadow of a doubt that such were the master German plans. The German Emperor had come from Coblenz to be present at this great epoch-making event—the breaking of the French eastern defense. He was dressed in his gala-day white, wearing the shining silver helmet, in honor of his Bavarian Army Corps, whose irresistible prowess he had come to witness. He had come to see the eastern jaw open and the eastern arm swing and deliver the blow. He had come to make his triumphal entrance into the city of Nancy.

The hearts of the Germans were in high glee. All Germany was rejoicing, for on August 31 the great victory of Tannenberg on the Russian front had been won and, as reported, some 80,000 prisoners had been taken. Russia had been beaten by the mighty Hindenburg. The Kaiser and his force were to win another equally momentous victory by forcing the eastern front, and thus letting loose the ponderous German armies which were expected to so soon grasp the French in their mighty teeth. Already the Germans foresaw the close of another victorious war. It had been but 30 days since their bugles had been blown. Austria had been subdued in 60 days in 1866 and France in 90 in 1870. Here again was to be the reward of German spirit, prowess, and kultur—France on her knees and the British Army gone in a combined whirlwind and tornado of war of less than 40 days. Little is the wonder that he was ready to make his triumphal entry into Nancy, the reason for which he had gone thither. So the battle opened on the 1st of September in a grand united assault upon the defense of Nancy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. No less than six army corps moved against the fortress of Verdun with the idea of taking it by assault, or if that was found inexpedient to surround and isolate this key position. To do so would permit the army of the Crown Prince to spare large numbers of troops to reinforce the armies to the west or south, as the necessities of events should develop. It is not giving too much praise to say that Verdun was saved by the astonishing rapidity by which the French absorbed the lessons of the experiences of this type of forts. Within six days, due to the activity and energy of Gen. Sarrail, the heavy guns were removed from their permanent emplacements and distributed in improvised situations on a greatly extended arc. This condition was first discovered by the Germans when in their advance guns of heavy caliber opened up from altogether new locations, while the old permanent locations remained inactive. The French learned the lesson early, very early, that the permanent fortifications could not stand. When it became apparent that Verdun had prepared to meet the oncoming German Army on the new and more modern plan—by concealed shifting defenses—the German activity lessened at that point and opened up farther south. It was on the 30th and 31st of August that the strength of Verdun was tested. Throughout the 31st and in the evening a strong bombardment broke out farther south to cover the transfer of troops to the area east of Nancy and vicinity.

On the 30th a very formidable force under Gen. Franz, consisting of a full corps belonging to the Fifth Army reserve, made a sortie out of Metz for the purpose of menacing the southern rim of forts of Verdun and incidentally to likewise threaten the northern outlying defenses of the Grand Couronné. On the 31st this force, after describing a semicircle, marched back into Germany without attempting a serious assault. This move is to be explained only on the theory of the necessity of having this force present as a reserve in the attack upon Nancy, which was already under swing. On the 31st the attack before Nancy opened by a terrific bombardment of heavy artillery. Over 400 pieces of heavy ordnance—an unheard-of number—took part in this preparation, but the bombardment was of short duration. Far less damage had been inflicted upon the French position than was supposed. The German commander's—Franz's—army was coming up, and altogether an enormous force had assembled. The condition of affairs was ominous. Late in the afternoon the infantry charge led out in countless hosts. The French had no equipment either in guns or men to meet this awful assault—nothing but the field 75-millimeter and machine guns. Fire of the French was reserved until the enemy was clearly within range of the guns. Then the very earth seemed in convulsion as the flame swept from eminence to eminence along the long, irregular chain of hills. Strong positions were prepared in the rear, so if the onrush could not be checked a fall back could be resorted to.

The Grand Couronné, and thereby the whole eastern front, was at stake. If this section was forced, Verdun, with its wonderfully complex system of new shifting forts, was or would be isolated and left to starve or surrender. The very landscape to the horizon seemed to be alive with men. At least six and probably eight full army corps were either in the assaulting force or held in reserve, amongst which was Gen. Franz's retiring troops. The eastern jaw of the grand enveloping movements had swung open; the strong eastern arm was delivering the blow. Fortunate it was that the French had sought dependence in no permanent fortifications, but, on the contrary, were wholly dependent upon the open fieldworks. When the batteries of 75 millimeters broke loose with their hail of fire against the solidly massed ranks, no force, be it composed of men, beasts, or devils, could withstand. But on they came, goaded, driven up the hills. Eventually this mass of humanity came within rifle and machine-gun range. Those who escaped the 75 millimeters now were met by these. The last wave was driven back at the point of the bayonet. At last the assault receded, and the tricolor was flying in victory.

Such tasks as the Germans imposed were to be endured not by men but by some substance not made of flesh and blood. The prowess of the 75-millimeter gun had been sustained in this awful scene. The loss among the Germans was appalling. For seven days this astounding and amazing spectacle was repeated and re-repeated. The Grand Couronné must be forced at whatever cost of men, for the two enveloping jaws must close together, if at all. Bombardments as fierce as fire and shot could make them preceded every charge of infantry. It was a constantly recurring enigma how the French could withstand them, but the French knew they held the keys to the future of France. If they should give way, and the great grand army drawn up all along the extended line from Paris to Verdun was gone, hopelessly gone, and with it the last hope of France. They fought like demons more than men, monsters more than human beings.

The crux came on the forenoon of the 6th of September, when every available man was brought into the final supreme effort, transcending, if possible, those which preceded it. It looked at once as if the St. Genevieve plateau was doomed, for it seemed that the French had not the strength to kill them all. The loss was truly appalling, the slaughter sickening. Near the summit a battalion of French Moroccans jumped from their trenches with bayonets, swords, knives, and spears in the air, screaming like mad men and made a charge down the slope. This saved the day and St. Genevieve was secure. The same or similar scenes were enacted all over the slope of Amace. The forests of Champeneaux were forced, but when they came to the hill they rolled back as wave after wave dashes against the very shore of fire. Amace was safe. After these awful days, especially after the 6th, the strength of the assault began to wane. From the first the French were as sure as human calculations could be made that they could hold the front, so sure indeed that the commander, de Castelnau, released some of the force. At least one division—the Forty-second—was sent to the western front to become part of that wonderful mass maneuver which opened the gates and turned in the tide when the tide was at the full.

Never throughout the war was there harder fighting, more desperate, more deadly, than was done by the comparatively small force defending the Grand Couronné. Never was there a defense more full of unyielding heroism. The pity of it all is that as yet no full and detailed history has been written. These battles alone had they been fought as isolated engagements would have rung down the pages of histories for centuries, but as they were part of a larger and more dramatic campaign going on elsewhere they have passed almost overlooked. When the time comes the historian will grasp the almost superhuman tasks which fell to the defenders of Nancy, and they will take their places amongst the most valiant defenders who in any age or in any time held the line for their beloved France.

By the 9th over 100,000 Germans had fallen dead or wounded on the hills, slopes, and valleys of the Grand Couronné. The French losses were not one-fourth. It is estimated that the strength of the respective forces was as 3½ to 6.

During this awful time the French had been informed of the grand counteroffensive on the long line to the west. The Kaiser had been wired of Kluck's southeast shunt and the attack on his flank and the campaign to cut his line of communications. He returned to Metz on the night of the 6th, having seen his great, invincible army of Bavarians hurled back, beaten, overwhelmed. It was inconceivable, incomprehensible, but true. The Grand Couronné de Nancy was safe, and that triumphal entry into Nancy is yet to be made. The east line remaining firm left the greater strategy of the French to be worked to its full on the east and west front.

BATTLES OF THE OUREQ AND THE MAJOR AND MINOR MORINS.

While the great battles were raging on the eastern front events of equal importance were taking place on the outskirts of Paris, 200 miles away. We had left Von Kluck, with his great First Army—the largest of them all—striking southeast when he had reached a point possibly 30 miles east of north of Paris. He had deliberately gone around Paris. On the night of September 3 a conference was held in Paris between the French generals, Joffre, Maunoury, and Gallieni, the military governor of Paris and a man of rare ability and wonderful energy. As a result of this conference, the plan of strategy as previously agreed upon was so changed as to take in another element. Instead of the French Sixth Army making a direct attack upon Kluck's army, giving away and thereby tolling Kluck off to the west, whereby the German line would be stretched to the breaking point, it was agreed that Maunoury should delay his attack until the major portion of Kluck's army was south of the Marne, when a combined attack should be made by the British on Kluck's front and by the French Sixth Army on his right flank and rear. The order of the attack was that the rear attack should open; then in the following order would come the flank attack; then the attack by the British on the front. The respective armies were in correct position and Kluck was stupidly stepping into the trap. This strategy of the French was the most brilliant conception of the campaign and would have resulted in the annihilation or capture of Kluck's army, and at least the right wing of Von Bülow's, had it been carried out. The British, however, failed to make the frontal attack, and thereby Kluck wheeled about, retraced his tracks, recrossed the Marne, and thereby escaped absolute destruction. Whether Joffre or Gallieni originated this idea is still disputed in France. To carry out this plan, however, would take a greater force than Maunoury then had, so the Fourth Corps was taken from Sarrail's command, transferred from Verdun—which had passed its crisis—sent to Paris, and attached to the French Sixth Army. The Forty-fifth Division had likewise been sent from before Nancy to join the Sixth Army. By this time, the night of the 4th, Kluck had most, by far the major part, of his army on the move. Bülow the same.

Little did these profound military men know of the very formidable force under Maunoury lying ready, waiting for the hours to pass when the First German Army should be south of the Marne. The Sixth French Army by the transfer of troops from other parts of the line had swollen by this time into an army of four incomplete corps, and was still further strengthened by another partial corps and one division. It is inconceivable that all these transfers and switching of troops took place without the knowledge of the high-sung intelligence arm of the German service, but it is what actually happened and actually was. The hour had now struck for the great French offensive.

On the afternoon of September 5 Gen. Joffre issued his famous order that the retreat had now come to an end; that the allied armies were to advance on the morrow. The order was received by the respective armies, British included, at about 7 o'clock in the evening. The armies involved the Sixth, British, Fifth, Center or Ninth, and the Fourth. Detail orders were given each army for the morrow.

The battle proper opened at the dawn of Sunday, September 6. On the 5th, however, Maunoury had attacked the reserve division left by Kluck to guard his line of communications. The moment that blow was struck Kluck began to realize the peril of his position, for by the strength of the blow it was apparent he had underestimated the size of the French Sixth Army. In fact, he had thought there was no such army. He now began to rapidly retrace his steps back across the Marne, describing almost a full circle. And right here the British failed to come up to what was expected of them. It was expected that the British would attack as Von Kluck was marching across their front. On this point I quote from Belloc's Elements of the Great War, Second Phase, pages 177 to 180:

"As it was, the mass of the German troops south of the Marne were disengaged and free to return at a moment's notice, and Kluck, taking immediate advantage of this lack of synchrony upon the part of the enemy * * * left his two cavalry divisions to form a screen watching the approach of the British, and recalled his Second active corps across the Marne to help the Fourth Reserve Corps, which was at grips with the French Sixth Army. * * * There seemed little to stop them. All the Fourth Reserve Corps together was, now that the French Forty-fifth Division had come up, less than half its opponents. The Oureq would have been crossed next day and Kluck destroyed had it been possible for the British to engage and hold the Germans south of the Marne."

But the great stricture of the British field marshal is made by the celebrated war correspondent and military writer, Mr. Frank Simonds, in volume 1 of his History of the World War, pages 120 to 125:

To the British was assigned exactly the rôle of Grouchy in the Waterloo campaign. Field Marshal French's army was expected to engage and hold Kluck's army while Maunoury struck its flank and rear. Kluck had two corps south of the Marne facing the British, in addition to cavalry, while the British had three corps. * * * The British failed exactly as did Grouchy, and the consequences of their failures was the escape of Kluck and the restriction of the allied victory. * * * Not only were the British not actively engaged at the Marne, but had they been able to do that which had been hoped for, if not expected of them, Kluck might have been destroyed and the Battle of the Marne might have been as immediately conclusive as Waterloo. * * * Here is the end of the legend that the British saved anything on the Marne; the sole question must be whether what was lost by reason of their failure was unavoidably lost. Could French have moved more swiftly? Did he let the supreme opportunity of the war slip through his fingers? Unmistakably this is the view of the French commentators, and to this view the British military criticism now points clearly. * * * On his own record, supported as it is by a wealth of testimony with respect to his actions during the Battle of the Marne, * * * it is difficult to escape the conviction that Field Marshal French failed to rise to the greatest opportunity of the war, either because he did not perceive it or lacked the necessary energy and initiative. * * * He never got across the Marne until the 9th, and then not in time to help Maunoury at all, * * * wrecking the whole strategic conception of the French high command, * * * depriving France of the maximum of possible benefits of a magnificently conceived stroke.

It is difficult to find in military history a more severe stricture upon an army commander. Had the British moved as they were ordered on the 5th, Kluck's army, instead of escaping, would have been destroyed or captured, and probably Bülow's, too, and thereby the greatest disaster in military history would have befallen the German armies.

In justifying his unfortunate delay Field Marshal French states that the British Army was so cut up, worn out, and depleted by casualties that reorganization was necessary before attack, and that this could not be done in time to catch Kluck south of the Marne.

As it was, Kluck passed back across the Marne and plunged with his whole army into Maunoury. From that date throughout the awful days to follow—the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th—Maunoury was sorely pressed, and at one critical time was really outflanked, and was saved only by the shrewdness of the commander and the supervalor of his men. On the morning of the 10th, when Maunoury was preparing to receive and, if possible, parry what he expected would be a crushing blow, behold, Kluck was gone, had fled to the north in precipitate haste, brought about by Foch's master blow further east on the line. Maunoury on the 6th was preparing to do to Kluck exactly what Jackson did to Hooker at Chancellorsville. The effect of the failure of the British, however, did not work the havoc it might have done. In Kluck's mad effort to envelop Maunoury's army he began that fatal leaning to the west which worked the subsequent dislocation of the line, stretching it beyond the possibility of safe defense.

The Battles of the Oureq and the Morins consist of that series of engagements, commencing on September 5, by Maunoury's attack upon the German Fourth Reserve Corps, Kluck's subsequent return to the north of the Marne, and the engagements which followed. The armies engaged were the First and Second German armies, and the Sixth and Fifth French armies. On these days it will be recalled that the eastern front was ablaze, as the 6th there was the critical day. Strange coincidence that the 6th should have been of the same importance on the extreme western front. Thus the sequence of the events. Events of supreme importance were taking place elsewhere on the line.

ASSAULT ON FORT TRYON.

South of Verdun and some 20 miles north of the Grand Couronné, between Verdun and Toul, there are a number of strong forts along the Meuse River. Fort Tryon was selected for assault. This was part of the effort to force the eastern front, though wholly separate and distinct from the terrific assaults farther south upon Nancy. The defenses of Nancy had stood during the great attack of the 6th. Now the Crown Prince had resolved to launch a grand attack on the river forts simultaneously with the renewal of that upon the Grand Couronné on the morrow. It was decided that neither his army nor troops from Pont-a-Mousson should lead in this assault, but new troops from Metz should be brought for this purpose. Fort Tryon was an old and rather obsolete fortress, though formidable, if properly garrisoned. Accordingly on the 7th a terrific assault was made, which was continued during the 7th, 8th, and 9th. If the front could be broken here Verdun would be isolated, Toul would fall, and the gap thus made would be equally disastrous to that if the Grand Couronné should be forced. Besides, the gap would carry with it the east and west railway and connections. Here again, in the defense of this fortress, do we find the same determination to hold as at the defenses of Nancy. After an awful artillery bombardment of six hours the infantry charged wave upon wave, but were driven back at the point of the bayonet. The fortress was reduced almost to ruins, while the German heavy guns, which were concealed in the valleys and wooded lands, suffered but little. During the early hours of the night of the 9th, even after the La Fere Champenoise, another tremendous assault was made, but the Second Cavalry Division from Toul had come up, and once again the threatened gap on the eastern front was closed. It is interesting to note that this very spot months afterwards was crushed in by greatly increased forces, and was extended out, forming the St. Mihiel salient, or sector, reduced by the Americans near the close of the war.

LA FERE CHAMPENOISE.

While the Battle of the Oureq and the Morins had not yielded the returns the Allies had hoped, still it had worked its fatal purpose. The victory the French Army had brought about was only lessened by degree. The original strategy so well planned by the French had become the true condition of affairs. Kluck, leaning, or, rather, deploying to the west in the Oureq battles, had brought Bülow's army with him, as contact on the line is fundamental. This had brought about the extension or stretching as the French had originally planned at the commencement of the battles. It was Bülow's army that had won the Battle of Charleroi. It was fine in personnel and equipment, consequently when it faced the depleted ranks of the French Fifth Army the latter had good grounds for apprehension. But Bülow had to draw back to the north and deploy to the west to keep in contact and alignment with Kluck. As the Second German Army thus withdrew, it was followed up and engaged in rear-guard actions. There were no set duels between the French Fifth Army under D'Esperay and the German Second Army under Bülow, though they held opposite fronts. On D'Esperay's right was the French center or Ninth Army under Foch. On Bülow's left was the German Third Army under Hausen—the Saxons. Directly in front of Foch were the now famous marshes of St. Gond, a moorland of considerable size, full of mire pits and stagnant pools. It is a strange spot in the otherwise solid and rolling terrain. The marshes are crossed by a few north and south roads, but only one to the east and west. It is absolutely impossible to get artillery through except over the roadways. Foch's line was to the south of these marshes, though he held the northern rims as outposts.

When Maunoury's attack compelled the retreat of Kluck and his famous circle back, taking Bülow with him, the German plan was to break the French center farther east, and to this rôle Hausen and his Saxons were assigned. This is just what the French Army was planning. Thus we have the two armies each attempting to cut the center of the other. Hausen's army, which had been reinforced by two full corps now, far outnumbered that of Foch. On the 7th Foch began an offensive, but was unable to dislodge the German Third Army. The marshes of which I speak lay directly in the pathway of any advance.

Eventually Foch had to give way to the oncoming Saxons, his right wing falling back south to a range of hills, where it held. Just at this juncture, when it seemed as if the French center was about to be cut, D'Esperay, who was only pursuing Bülow on Foch's left, transferred his Tenth Corps to Foch. This fresh addition to Foch's army suddenly changed conditions.

The line of Foch was now rapidly assuming a north and south front, due to the right wing giving way. The Tenth Corps began its assault on the Hausen right wing, which had been weakened somewhat by transfer of troops to the left wing in the hopes of pursuing Foch's right. This immediately removed the pressure, and thus Foch's center regained its stability on an approximately northwest-southeast front. This all occurred on September 8. The Guard which held the position between Hausen's right and Bülow's left was one of the forces attacking the French most wildly.

On the night of the 8th the French situation was critical. Foch's right was driven back a distance somewhere in the neighborhood of 8 miles. All felt that the morrow would be the fatal day—the Germans believed it, the French knew it. The morning opened bright and clear, and the struggle increased in intensity. Already a gap was forming in the German lines in the position held by the Guard. This gap was widening as the Guards deployed to the east and south to add to the pressure on Foch's right wing. Apparently but a small portion of the Guard was left to hold the line. Large masses were withdrawn and shunted to the left to crush Foch's right before advantage could be taken. It was here that the genius of Foch shone brightest. The Forty-second Division, a mass of picked troops, was withdrawn from the lines and shunted to the east, there to take position behind the Ninth Corps. This division received orders to advance at 4 o'clock in the afternoon directly down through a wooded tract over an intervening plateau and strike the gap thus formed. The Forty-second was soon in line, and for nearly 4 miles headed straight through the woodland over the hills.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question in reference to the attack against Von Kluck?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. In regard to Gallieni's taxicab army, has not the size or strength of it been overestimated? It was a very spectacular and sensational matter, but I would like the idea of the gentleman in regard to the number thrown into it. While these reserves were of vital importance, I feel the number has been exaggerated. Was it not in the neighborhood of 6,000 men that Gallieni threw in the line by means of busses and taxicabs, soldiers taken from the garrisons of Paris?

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman is right. The Fourth Division had been transferred from the Grand Couronné, and had been attached to the Sixth Army. Gallieni's spectacular taxicab campaign could not have been the transfer of those troops from the railroad out to the field of battle. I agree with the gentleman that these taxicab troops must have been a part of the Paris garrison, or perhaps they might have been troops which as yet had not reached their regular units—just picked up and thrown in.

It was 5 o'clock and 10 minutes when the shock came—a running, screaming, shouting band with fire and bayonets getting in its most deadly blows. After the Forty-second Division came the Ninth Corps. A desperate death struggle advance was ordered by Foch along the entire center. The gap gave way and through it poured the French by the thousands, deploying to the right and left, bayoneting, firing, crushing, and grinding their way. The day was done, the battle of the ages was won. The mass of Hausen's army to the right of the gap, learning that the breach of the lines had been made by the forces under Gen. Foch, wheeled to the west and attempted to force the closing of the gap by side facing. But no army composed of human beings can be thus shifted in a moment's notice.

Foch had succeeded in doing at La Fere Champenoise exactly what Marlborough did at Blenheim. He did what Napoleon repeatedly attempted to do at Waterloo, and what Lee endeavored to do at Gettysburg.

As the evening passed Bülow gave way, and following him in desperate pursuit came the army of D'Esperay. The Saxons farther east, learning that the gap had extended to the German first army, likewise gave way, forming into bodies in retreat and rear guards as best they could. The pellmell was continued throughout the night in one of the awfulest storms that ever settled down in the valley of the Marne. The whole German line broke. The retreat of the armies of Kluck and Bülow were perfectly orderly but the Saxons broke into routs. It became a man-for-man escape. Nothing like so complete a rout had ever before befallen a Saxon Army. All night long and during the next day the retreat was continued with the French in pursuit, and only stopped at the utter exhaustion of the pursuers and the pursued. The giving away of the German line was the tragedy which crumbled and then crushed the whole strategy, so carefully planned and builded up over a period of 40 years. It thoroughly and profoundly changed the whole course of the war. The French had won a victory which will live as long as history can be read by human eyes. The losses were appalling. Of the 2,250,000 men and more engaged between Paris and Verdun, fully 300,000 were left on the field dead or wounded. These, added to the 100,000 killed or wounded in the Grand Couronné, and at Fort Tryon, made a grand total of approximately 400,000 men.

Such was the awful cost in men of the victory of the Marne between September 1 and 9, 1914. Of this loss, perhaps that of the French was the greater. The great fact, the one that will make rich the pages of French history for all ages to come, is the paradox that the lesser is more powerful than the greater. The Germans greatly outnumbered the French. On the whole line the proportion was given by Belloc as five to between seven and one-half and eight—amazing results from such disparagement in numbers. From Verdun south the German excess was by far the greatest per mile front on the entire line.

De Cary's Fourth French Army held like a gigantic wall. He was on the right of Foch, and notwithstanding Foch's line was badly sagged and all but pierced, De Cary's troops had indirectly much to do with saving the day at this point. He had a reserve corps engaged in executing a flank movement upon the advancing Germans at the time Foch's Forty-second Division cut the line farther to the west.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed to conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington may proceed to conclusion. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. Such splendid coordination of troops was never before known in military history. Troops were sent from place to place, some detouring from before Nancy to before Paris. Divisions and brigades shunted from front to front. And lastly, the service of the wonderful mobile artillery of the French. Its performance at the Marne was in harmony with and up to the high standard its most enthusiastic champions had pictured. The 75-millimeter gun from that day to this lies near to the heart of every son of France. A heavier gun would have failed in mobility. Some say that the seventy-fives won the day, while all unite in saying without them it might have been lost. The Germans used an unreasonably small amount of artillery for such an engagement, due to its lack of mobility.

Of course, La Fere Champenoise was the storm center—the vortex of the east and west line. The great bulk of the Forty-second Division passed between the marshes of St. Gond and La Fere, and it was here the battle raged wildest. Mr. Eric Fisher Wood reports counting over eleven hundred dead bodies on a 6-acre field on the third day after the battle and after all the wounded had been removed. But desperate as the fighting here was, it perhaps did not exceed that which took place on the Grand Couronné a hundred miles to the east.

Such are the battles of the Marne. History turned more pages between September 1 and 10 than in any equal length of time since it began recording the acts of men. The French had won. Gravelotte, Sedan, and Metz were avenged. The world could breathe again.

As in all great battles—victories—great names are made—great fame came to men, and great names and great fames were lost, buried in the awful whirlpool of defeat. The world holds out little hope for the vanquished, so Moltke, chief of staff, Kluck, Bülow, and Hausen sank from the scene of all activity—demoted, dishonored, and disgraced. Not so with the victors. Upon them the world places the wreath of fame; thus Joffre and Foch and all the other great commanders will live in history as long as it is read by human eyes or heard by human ears. To go to battle seems to be the fate of men, but of all who have gone before throughout all the ages, none have shown brighter on the field than the sons of France at the battles of the Marne. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar not objected to, and bills objected to to retain their place on the calendar for future consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

and pending that asks unanimous consent that bills unobjected to be considered and that bills objected to remain and retain their place on the calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent instead of moving.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated unanimous consent—that he asked unanimous consent for the latter part. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did not ask unanimous consent, he moved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has no right to move, and so the Chair stated that as a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, that being true as the Chair holds, that he has no right to move, but simply determines the matter by unanimous consent, then a motion would not be in order as a substitute.

I intended to move a substitute that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar without restriction. But if it is not by unanimous consent that would not be in order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM E. JOHNSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 683) for the relief of William E. Johnson.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Indian Affairs authorized me to make a report on this bill. The report is quite extensive and gives practically a history of the claim.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I have listened for the Chair to submit the unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked if there was objection and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] reserved the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I also reserve the right to object.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. The report, I say, contains a history of the claim in detail.

This claim originated at the trial of an Indian by the name of Juan Cruz in the State of New Mexico and in the county in which I live. I was present when they brought this Indian up to the county seat of my county to be tried, and this man, William E. Johnson, was acting as a special agent for the Indian Department.

We all took it for granted that the expenses incurred in this trial were going to be paid out of the special fund provided for in the appropriation carried in the Indian appropriation bill for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I will.

Mr. BEGG. This is for attorney's fees that William E. Johnson expended?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not know whether he was an attorney or not. I say he was acting as agent for the Indian Department at that time.

Mr. HAYDEN. At that time, I may say, Mr. Chairman, he was the chief special officer, employed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians.

Mr. BEGG. I would like the gentleman to be more specific. Is this $1,839.95 money that he has expended out of his own funds or is this a payment for services?

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no. This is money that he expended, and for which he asks to be reimbursed.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I say we took it for granted that the expenses incurred in this trial were going to be paid out of that special fund which was provided in the appropriation bill for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians, but it seems the money was not available for that purpose, and the Comptroller or the Auditor for the Treasury Department decided that the money could be paid only in this manner, and therefore that is the way this bill originated.

I know all the persons mentioned in the report. I know that they were there at the trial. When they took this Indian to be tried there in the district court——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the right to object for the purpose of asking a few questions of the gentleman who has charge of the bill. This bill, seeking to pay William E. Johnson $1,839, proposes to pay him this amount to reimburse him for various sums which he claims to have paid to 37 different other parties; also to pay himself the following amounts——

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. William E. Johnson, traveling expenses and expenses on account of Clara True, $49.50 and $19.70, respectively; also to William E. Johnson, traveling expenses, $771.30, and expenses of Clara D. True, $16.40; then to William E. Johnson, traveling expenses again as a posse man, $29.80; also to William E. Johnson, photographs, $6; also to William E. Johnson, salary and per diem, $33; also to William E. Johnson, traveling expenses again—this is the third item of traveling expenses—$38.95. The first one was $49.50 and the next was $771.30, respectively. Then again to William E. Johnson, expenses of posse man, $672.55. That is the second such item.

Now, it occurs to me that these amounts seem to be unexplained duplications, and there also seem to be traveling expenses of six or seven hundred dollars in two or three items unexplained; they seem to be out of all reason and out of all proportion.

Now, one other question: I would like the gentleman to explain the justness of each one of these items. Then again, this question: If the amount set forth is due to anybody for these 37 different people who have given service, it would be to the persons themselves who rendered the service. This bill proposes to pay the whole $1,839 to William E. Johnson. How do we know that William E. Johnson will take the money that Congress gives him, if these people have not already been paid, and distribute it properly among the people to whom it belongs?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I understand these people have all been paid.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. One other matter. This service was for the benefit, as I understand it, of a certain tribe of Indians?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It was to enforce the liquor-traffic law amongst these Indians and for that special tribe. If it was for their benefit, and their benefit alone, why should not the funds of this particular Indian tribe meet this expense and be used? I would like the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. In the first place, these Indians have no funds.

Mr. BLANTON. Most of the tribes have funds. Some of them are richer than anybody in this House. I know of some tribes that are richer than a great many of us.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. This particular tribe of Indians, as I say, have no funds, and in addition to that this prosecution was carried on under the direction of the Indian Office. William E. Johnson was the special agent of the Indian Office employed for that purpose.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] mentions the voucher of William E. Johnson, $771.30, that was allowed, except $16.40. That probably covered his expenses for traveling in various parts of the United States, and in the voucher these items of $16.40 and $30 were disallowed. The balance of the voucher has already been paid. The only other large item unpaid to Mr. Johnson is part of voucher 208, expenses of posse man, $672.55.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who has been a distinguished peace officer in his State, and who has rendered valuable services to his country in that position, did not catch my point, which was that these large sums have already been allowed this particular gentleman and paid to him, with the exception of the small amounts disallowed; and without some explanation of the extra amount to show that it is justly claimed by him, when he has already been paid large amounts for traveling expenses running up into hundreds of dollars, I take it that we should have some explanation of the justness of the balance of the claim.

Mr. HAYDEN. The explanation of the balance is perfectly simple. William E. Johnson acted as chief special officer for the Indian Service, handling an appropriation of about $100,000 a year, to suppress the liquor traffic in the Indian tribes. He traveled in all parts of the United States and assisted in the prosecution of persons who had sold liquor to the Indians. In the course of his travels he went into New Mexico to assist in the defense of Juan Cruz, a posse man, who was charged with murder for an act performed by him in the arrest of a person who had voilated the law. Mr. Johnson believed that the posse man had acted properly, and that he deserved to be defended, because he was enforcing a law of the United States. So Mr. Johnson proceeded to defend him, and the posse man was acquitted. Mr. Johnson, acting as the chief special officer, believing that he had a right to defend the posse man who had engaged in the enforcement of the law, issued vouchers to various people in connection with the expenses of the trial, and vouchers for his own expenses in connection with the trial. These vouchers were all disapproved by the Auditor for the Interior Department in Washington on the ground that the appropriation for the enforcement of the Indian liquor laws could not be applied to the defense of the posse man. Now, the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs examined all these vouchers—approved every one of them—and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a letter which is included in the report, stated that the money was properly expended and that Johnson should be reimbursed for these amounts. Of course, when Mr. Johnson issued a voucher and it was not paid he had to pay it himself.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has passed upon the justness of this claim, and holds that it is a just claim and that it ought to be paid, why is not that stated in the report?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is so stated in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not so understand it. This merely gives the items of the claim but does not state that there has been any official determination of the matter.

Mr. HAYDEN. It appears right here in the commissioner's report:

> As they were incurred in good faith and under the instructions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Johnson should be reimbursed therefor, and I recommend favorable action in that amount.

That is from the original report made on a similar bill in 1916, and it is repeated in the report made this year, June 23, 1919:

> In view of the merits of the case and our former reports I have the honor to recommend that favorable action be taken and that appropriate legislation be enacted reimbursing Mr. Johnson in the sum of $1,839.95.

There is no question about the merits or justice of this claim. It was regularly approved by the Indian Office and forwarded to be paid, but was disapproved by the auditor on the technicality that the appropriation made for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians could not be used in the defense of a posse man who was engaged in that duty. That is all there is to this case.

Mr. ROSE. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to make the statement that Mr. Johnson has already been paid part of this claim?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; Mr. Johnson submitted a combined voucher for expenses, including this case and other cases. He was paid the amount due for expenses in the other cases, but the items in the voucher covering the expenses in this case were disallowed by the auditor, for the technical reason which I have stated.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would make inquiry of those who are the proponents of this measure as to what was the allowance for the defense of this posse man or noncommissioned officer engaged in the suppression of the liquor traffic, because it appears in the report that the total disallowance on account of the Juan Cruz defense was $1,839.95. I think we should know what the allowance was, so that we may form an opinion in the absence of any itemized payment of what the large amount due Johnson was for, because in the bill as presented the two outstanding large amounts are William E. Johnson, traveling expenses, $771.30, and for the posse men $672.55.

Mr. HAYDEN. That $771.30 is the voucher, and only $46 had anything to do with this case. The balance was paid but there was nothing in the balance in connection with this case. Everything that related to Juan Cruz has been disallowed.

Mr. GARD. How much was allowed for Juan Cruz's defense?

Mr. HAYDEN. Nothing.

Mr. GARD. It is stated that there was a total disallowance, and certainly some lawyer defended him.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; there was nothing allowed on this; all this allowance relates to the defense of Juan Cruz, and not one cent was allowed.

Mr. GARD. Where is the allowance for legal services?

Mr. HAYDEN. There was no necessity for allowing anything for legal services, because they called upon the United States attorney to defend him.

Mr. GARD. Was there not other counsel employed to defend him?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; no record of it.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman from New Mexico state whether we are to face again a bill for a lawyer's services to this man?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. No.

Mr. GARD. Who was his attorney?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. A man by the name of Wilson, who was the United States special attorney.

Mr. GARD. He defended the man?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes. The question was raised as to whether or not the district court had jurisdiction over the case. The district judge decided that he had none and that it belonged to the United States court, and so the trial was stopped, and he sent the case down to Santa Fe to be tried in the United States court. Mr. Wilson was the United States attorney, and he raised that question.

Mr. GARD. And when it went into the United States court who defended him?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. The United States district attorney, and also Mr. Wilson, special United States attorney for the Pueblo Indians. So these expenses were incurred in traveling up and down between the Pueblo Indian village and the county seat in my county.

Mr. GARD. When was the case tried?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. In 1911.

Mr. HAYDEN. It has been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs several times since 1916.

Mr. GARD. Why was not it adjudicated between 1911 and 1916?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because it was pending in the auditor's office, and there was no other form of relief except to come to Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the further right to object, what about the objection I raised as to the protection of these various people. Is Mr. Johnson a man of property?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question about Mr. Johnson's character. He is well known.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know the gentleman; but undoubtedly these sums have not been paid to the 37 different people, and they are the ones who should receive the funds from the Government. If Mr. Johnson is not a man of property, if he is not solvent, I take it the bill ought to be amended so as to have the Treasury pay these respective sums directly to the people to whom they belong.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that they should go to the people to whom they belong.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What is there in the record that leads the gentleman to say that these people have not received their money?

Mr. BLANTON. Nothing but common business experience. That tells me that Johnson would not take this money out of his pocket and pay to these people.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The presumption is that he was a disbursing officer and that he could not hire so many men and not pay them these sums.

Mr. HAYDEN. All these people have been paid. Mr. Johnson was disbursing officer.

Mr. BLANTON. If true, that is an answer to the objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman from New Mexico allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman know Mr. Johnson?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He is a man of good reputation, is he not?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I know him, and the gentleman does not think he would come in here and make these claims if they had not been paid.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I have no doubt that these small sums have been paid.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is it not a fact that Mr. Johnson is financially a reliable man?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not know about his financial ability, but he was responsible enough to hold this position.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does not the gentleman think these sums could be paid out of the property of Mr. Johnson?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. This man Cruz was being tried, and Mr. Johnson was an officer in the Indian department?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. What was he being tried for?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. He killed another Indian while trying to apprehend a bootlegger. He was going in a wagon, and there was a suspicion that he was taking liquor into the Pueblo village. He intercepted this Indian and searched the wagon and found liquor there, and in the quarrel that ensued Cruz shot this other Indian.

Mr. BEGG. Was Cruz convicted or acquitted?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. He was set free.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman mean to leave this House under the impression that if an officer of the United States Government in the Indian affairs department gets into trouble while discharging his duties there is no way to pay for his defense, without a special act of Congress, out of the funds of the Indian department?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not know why the Comptroller of the Treasury held that this was not payable out of the funds I speak of.

Mr. BEGG. Would it not be a good thing to have the comptroller's reasons before this House is asked to vote this money?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do not know about that. This has been hanging fire here since 1911, and these small amounts were paid by Johnson.

Mr. BEGG. That has been stated a number of times. Did he pay them, or did he issue vouchers which they could not collect?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. He issued them vouchers which I understand were afterwards returned unpaid.

Mr. BEGG. Did he pay them out of his own funds, or let them go and hold the vouchers?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I understand that he paid these small amounts. He has paid them before.

Mr. BEGG. Has the Committee on Indian Affairs gone into these items severally, verified them to their satisfaction?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Yes; I was present when this trial was being held, and I know everyone of those people mentioned on that account. They were there as witnesses, doctors, interpreters, and stenographers. I do not know about the payment by Johnson himself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right further to object, I wish to make inquiry whether Johnson at this time was in the employ of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and received compensation from that bureau?

Mr. HAYDEN. He was then the chief special officer of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, charged with the enforcement of laws against selling liquors to Indians, and he received compensation and was entitled to have his expenses paid wherever he traveled.

Mr. GARD. If that be true, why was not his regular compensation and allowance for expenses paid in this case, since there was a direction upon the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to assist this Indian charged with murder?

Mr. HAYDEN. The only way he could be compensated was out of the fund for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians.

Mr. GARD. He got his other compensation?

Mr. HAYDEN. He did not get any compensation for this service.

Mr. GARD. He got his regular compensation out of the fund for the administration of Indian affairs.

Mr. HAYDEN. All of his compensation, every cent that could be paid to him as chief special officer, came out of that particular appropriation for the suppression of liquor traffic among the Indians. If he did anything in the course of his employment which the auditor said could not be paid out of that fund he could not be paid at all.

Mr. GARD. What was his regular salary per annum? How much did he get a month, or however he was paid?

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that he was paid at that time at the rate of $1,800 per annum, with traveling expenses and allowances.

Mr. GARD. He got traveling expenses and allowances, and now he wants additional traveling expenses and allowances for this particular thing?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; wherever Mr. Johnson went he turned in vouchers in proper form for his traveling expenses and allowances. He turned them in in this case, but they were not paid. This is a disallowance by the auditor.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be laid aside temporarily without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill may be temporarily passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLAIM OF SIOUX INDIANS BEFORE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sioux Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, which have not heretofore been determined by the Court of Claims, may be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party for determination of the amount, if any, due said tribe from the United States under any treaties, agreements, or laws of Congress, or for the misappropriation of any of the funds of said tribe, or for the failure of the United States to pay said tribe any money or other property due; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with the right of either party to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to hear and determine all legal and equitable claims, if any, of said tribe, against the United States, and to enter judgment thereon.

SEC. 2. That if any claim or claims be submitted to said courts, they shall settle the rights therein, both legal and equitable, of each and all the parties thereto, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation, and any payment which may have been made upon any claim so submitted shall not be pleaded as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suits or actions, and the United States shall be allowed credit for all sums, including gratuities, heretofore paid or expended for the benefit of said tribe or any band thereof. The claim or claims of the tribe, or band or bands thereof, may be presented separately or jointly by petition, subject, however, to amendment; suit to be filed within five years after the passage of this act, and such action shall make the petitioner or petitioners party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant, and any band or bands of said tribe or any other tribe or band of Indians the court may deem necessary to a final determination of such suit or suits may be joined therein as the court may order. Such petition, which shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by said Sioux Tribe or any bands thereof, shall set forth all the facts on which the claims for recovery are based, and said petition shall be signed by the attorney or attorneys employed, and no other verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, documents, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of said tribe or bands thereof to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys for said tribe or bands of Indians.

SEC. 3. That if it be determined by the Court of Claims in the said suit herein authorized that the United States Government has wrongfully appropriated any lands belonging to the said Sioux Tribe of Indians, damages therefor shall be confined to the value of the said land at the time of said appropriation, together with interest at 3 per cent per annum, and the decree of the Court of Claims with reference thereto, when satisfied, shall annul and cancel all claim and title of the said Sioux Tribe or any other tribe or band of Indians in and to said lands, as well as all damages for all wrongs and injuries, if any, committed by the Government of the United States with reference thereto.

SEC. 4. That upon the final determination of such suit, cause, or action the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as it shall find consonable to be paid the attorney or attorneys employed therein by said tribe or bands of Indians, under contracts negotiated and approved as provided by existing law, and in no case shall the fee decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amounts stipulated in the contracts approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and no attorney shall have a right to represent the said tribe or any band thereof in any suit, cause, or action under the provisions of this act until his contract shall have been approved as herein provided. The fees decreed by the court to the attorney or attorneys of record shall be paid out of any sum or sums recovered in such suits or actions, and no part of such fee shall be taken from any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to such tribe or bands of Indians in whose behalf the suit is brought unless specifically authorized in the contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by said court amount to more than 10 per cent of the amount of the judgment recovered in such cause.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. A delegation of Congressmen and representatives of the railroad departments of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota recently visited Mr. Barnes in New York to urge him to give new instructions to his agents and licensees in respect to the purchase of rusted wheat.

Some of the members of the delegation have asked me to make a statement to the House, partly because there was no stenographic record made of the hearing, and also upon the theory that it is believed some of the newspapers have claimed too much credit for North Dakota. Whatever the reason may be I shall try to make a brief report and be fair to our sister States.

To begin with, the first move was not made by farmers at Hillsboro, N. Dak. They did not do anything until after they heard that a formal hearing was to be had before Mr. Barnes at New York by special arrangement. A farmer living near Tower City wrote to me. He said he had just thrashed, but had not hauled his wheat to market, but thought from the looks of it that it would grade pretty low. The sample which he sent to me indicated that his judgment was correct, and my presumption was that there was much more like it in the State. A careful study of the grain-standards law did not disclose any way to get relief through the National Bureau of Markets or the Secretary of Agriculture, who were compelled by law to give several months' notice before changing the grades. The right seemed to be left, however, to sell wheat on sample or by description, and I urged that view on Mr. Barnes, having had a couple of conversations with him at New York over the long-distance telephone. During the second conversation I suggested a hearing of northwestern men, to which Mr. Barnes readily agreed. The next step was to issue invitations. It seemed to me that all interested in the marketing of rusted wheat should be requested to come. Accordingly telegrams were sent to the governors of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota. I ask leave to print in the RECORD, without reading, these and other telegrams, letters, and newspaper articles.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House, can a gentleman at this time, the House being in Committee of the Whole, ask consent to extend remarks upon a bill not being considered by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is possible to do so by unanimous consent, although it is better practice to do it in the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Copy telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1919.

To the GOVERNOR OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, N. Dak.:

I have arranged with Julius H. Barnes for a hearing before him at the office of the United States Grain Corporation, New York, on August 26, of a delegation of northwestern wheat men. The purpose is to urge him to buy wheat at its milling value. The United States officials will not and can not change their rules for grading, but President Barnes is free to fix prices for the various grades or buy on sample and thus remedy the serious losses suffered by farmers by reason of the highly technical United States grades. Two years ago I introduced a delegation to President Barnes in which you were represented. We succeeded at that time in securing directions from Barnes to his representatives to settle for the various grades upon more favorable terms, thus saving millions of dollars to northwestern wheat growers. Now is the time to urge our case again and strike hard. I hope all the members of the railroad commission can be present, also a representative of inspection department with a full line of samples and fully prepared to show the actual conditions. Please wire the names to me of those who will represent our State. It should be made clear that all interested farmers are invited to come.

GEORGE M. YOUNG,
Member of Congress from North Dakota.

Similar telegrams were sent to the governors of Minnesota and South Dakota, and, while the invitation was general, it appealed to me as wise to make sure of the attendance of certain experts in order to marshal all the facts to the best possible advantage at the hearing. This is a day of specialists. So I sent telegrams to President E. F. Ladd, Fargo, who had been associated with me in wheat studies for a dozen years and generally acknowledged to be the pioneer chemist in wheat and flour and a food chemist of the first rank; also to Commissioner O. P. B. Jacobson, of Minnesota, who had made an excellent exhibit of wheat and flour at a former hearing before Mr. Barnes; also to John M. Anderson, president of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, St. Paul, a great farmers' selling agency, which has given him an opportunity to get in close touch with wheat growers of the northwest and become thoroughly familiar with every phase of grain marketing; also to H. N. Owen, publisher of Farm, Stock and Home, Minneapolis, who has made a special study of all marketing problems.

I also wanted to make sure of the attendance of my life-long friend, Samuel J. Aandahl, who is now serving as chairman of the North Dakota Board of Railroad Commissioners, so a telegram was sent to him reaching him while at work at the thrashing rig on his own farm. He at once came on to Washington and New York, where he helped us to prepare and present our case. Telegrams were received from the others, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 20, 1919.

Hon. G. M. YOUNG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Will be in New York with grain samples at McAlpin Monday.

O. P. B. JACOBSON.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Commissioner J. W. Raish will be at the McAlpin Hotel, New York, Tuesday morning, August 26.

H. A. USTRUS,
Secretary South Dakota Railroad Commission.

FARGO, N. DAK., August 26, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Will try to be present at grain hearing if Gov. Frazier so requests.

Will attend hearing. Important that you have Commissioner Jacobson, Col. March, and Thomas Cashman present.

H. N. OWEN.

BISMARCK, N. DAK., August 22, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Dr. Ladd will represent North Dakota at hearing New York.

LYNN J. FRAZIER.

Some newspaper articles will be printed, and those of you who are further interested will find them in to-morrow morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These articles are as follows:

[From the Courier News, Fargo.]

MEETING AT NEW YORK ONE OF INTEREST.

NEW YORK, August 26.

The meeting of the northwestern wheat delegation with President Julius H. Barnes, of the United States Grain Corporation, to-day was full of interest. The men from the West were crisp and to the point in what they had to say, and they found in Mr. Barnes a man thoroughly experienced in the growing and handling of grain and quick to catch the point of the arguments made by the different speakers.

Congressman GEORGE M. YOUNG, of North Dakota, chairman of the delegation, made the opening address. He said that this year as in all years when wheat was shrunken by reason of black rust, that the wheat grown in the hard belt was exceptionally high in protein content, the quality that makes muscle and brain, and that the winter wheat of the East and South was unusually low this year in protein, and that the Northwestern wheat was therefore of more than usual value to mix with the winter wheat. He told about the close resemblance of the kind of wheat grown this year to that grown 15 years ago. At that time a farmer came to his office to ask his advice about selling then or holding until the following summer. YOUNG said to hold it until the following summer if it would make a marketable flour, but neither YOUNG nor his friend knew whether it would or not. No farmer knew; only those who bought it knew. YOUNG declared that he made up his mind to try for a State law which would establish a small experimental flour mill and baking and chemical laboratory at the Fargo Agricultural College, so that every farmer would be able to find out the value of his wheat. He introduced such a bill and secured its passage after strong opposition. The experimental plant was placed in charge of Edwin F. Ladd, then professor of chemistry, and now president of the college.

LADD MAKES APPEAL.

Young then introduced President Ladd, who made a strong, forceful argument for the recognition this year of the real, actual value of northwestern wheat for flour purposes, claiming that the only logical way to do so was to pay what it is actually worth. He showed with great detail and clearness the results of his own experiments and, at least in the opinion of other members of the delegation, made out his case beyond question.

Ladd was followed by O. P. B. Jacobson, of the grain and warehouse commission, who exhibited a very complete line of wheat samples, which he had gathered from wheat shipments reaching the terminals from Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Congressman BAER made a strong argument. He said, in part:

FOUGHT FOR NEW GRADES.

"I have always fought for more liberal grain-grading laws. The present system of Federal grades is too complex and it should be simplified. Complicated grain grading always works to the detriment of the producers. They have been discriminated against time and again by arbitrary grades which were fixed by the millers and wheat speculators. For example, in 1916 we raised what was known as feed wheat, the poorest grade being D-feed, the market price of which was sometimes 90 cents lower than the best grade, No. 1 northern. Dr. E. F. Ladd, president of the North Dakota Agricultural College, proved by actual experiments in the university mill that there was only 11 cents difference in the milling value of these two grades; consequently, the farmers lost nearly 80 cents on every bushel of this lower grade which they raised during 1916. Something must be done to remedy this situation, which now prevails to some extent in the wheat market. I believe, however, that under the new State law passed by the farmers of North Dakota the producers obtain a more liberal interpretation of the law and better prices for their wheat than in the nearby States."

REVISION NECESSARY.

Congressman SINCLAIR, of North Dakota, followed with a statement full of argument. He said:

"In view of the very widespread damage to the 1919 wheat crop of the United States by heat and rust, it would seem that a careful revision and application of the grades and prices by the Grain Corporation was necessary in order not to work a hardship upon the producers of this important article of food. It has been pretty well demonstrated that the present grades are unfair to the wheat growers, especially should the grain be slightly inferior in quality. The real value of a bushel of wheat is determined by the amount of flour and bread that can be produced from it, and all grades and prices should be based upon a milling and baking test. This fact was recognized by Mr. Hoover when he ignored all grades and fixed a certain amount of wheat that should be required to produce a barrel of flour. The farmers of the Northwest do not want a repetition of the 'Feed D' scandal of 1916; what they want is a fair price for all the wheat that they produce. Wheat growing is at best an uncertain financial undertaking, and at a time when it is of such prime importance to the world that the maximum of production should be maintained it is very necessary that the farmer should be encouraged to the utmost by protecting him fully in the marketing of his crop."

Part of article in Fargo Forum follows:

A MONTANA VIEW.

No special representative was sent by the State government of Montana, but wheat growers throughout the State sent samples of wheat to Congressman CARL W. RIDDICK, and by exhibiting these he was able to give Mr. Barnes information as to the character of the wheat crop grown in Montana. He said:

"I speak for the farmers of Montana. The weather during the wheat-growing period has been unusually dry, with hot winds. The wheat yield in some places was nothing. Other fields yielded from 2 to 6 bushels per acre. As a result of the drought conditions the wheat kernels are small and shrunken. Under the grading rules adopted by the Government this wheat is given a low grade, and a proportionately low price is paid for it. As a matter of fact, this wheat makes good flour, and in the name of wheat-growing farmers of the Northwest, who believe their request is just, I ask that instructions be issued by the United States Grain Corporation to its field representatives that this wheat be so handled that it shall bring to the producing farmer the money it is worth, based on the quality and quantity of flour it will produce.

"Because of the drought, wheat-growing farmers of my section of the country have not made expenses this year. These farmers need and deserve to receive every cent their product is worth. Many of them are working on small capital or no capital at all. They desire to continue to develop their farms and to put in crops of wheat for next year to help supply the world demand for food."

Other Members of Congress are to speak this afternoon, and it is expected that the hearing will be finished late to-day.

WASHINGTON BUREAU OF THE MINNEAPOLIS JOURNAL,
Washington, August 27.

A reduction of about one-half in the spread in prices of wheat between No. 1 and No. 5 was predicted by Members of the House who conferred with Julius Barnes, president of the United States Grain Corporation, upon their return to Washington from New York to-day. The new schedule will be made public by Mr. Barnes in New York to-morrow.

"Mr. Barnes told us the present spread in prices is wholly unjustified," said Representative SYDNEY ANDERSON, of Minnesota. "He was very much in sympathy with what we had to say, and I am satisfied that the farmers of the Northwest are going to benefit greatly as a result of yesterday's hearing."

MINNESOTA CONGRESSMEN ATTEND.

Those in attendance at the conference with Mr. Barnes to fix the fair relation at which the lower grade and damaged qualities of this year's wheat crop should be bought by the Grain Corporation as compared with the guaranty price of No. 1 wheat were Representatives GEORGE M. YOUNG, SYDNEY ANDERSON, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, and HALVOR STEENERSON, of Minnesota; JOHN M. BAER, J. H. SINCLAIR, and CARL W. RIDDICK; Dr. E. F. Ladd, of the North Dakota Agricultural College; O. P. B. Jacobson, of the Minnesota Railway and Warehouse Commission; D. P. O'Neil, State board of grain appeals, of Minnesota; I. J. Murphy, railroad commissioner of South Dakota; H. N. Owen, editor of Farm, Stock, and Home, Minneapolis; J. N. Anderson, of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, of St. Paul; S. J. Aandahl, of North Dakota Railroad Commission; and N. J. Holmberg, commissioner of agriculture of Minnesota; and A. C. Smith, of Minnesota.

The Courier-News, Fargo, under date of August 30, prints the following:

BARNES'S ACTION CALLED BIGGEST LEAGUE VICTORY—HAGAN DECLARES NONPARTISAN PRINCIPLES VINDICATED IN DECISION ON NEW WHEAT PRICES.

THE COURIER-NEWS BISMARCK BUREAU,
Bismarck, August 29.

Julius Barnes's action in substituting the milling value of wheat for the Federal grain grades for this year's crop is the biggest victory the Nonpartisan League has won, is the opinion of John N. Hagan, commissioner of agriculture and labor, who discussed the new grain-buying basis to be put in effect by the United State Grain Corporation.

The hearing consumed an entire day, and naturally no newspaper article could give a complete account of the proceedings. In order to supplement the newspaper record, and in order to recognize the part played by the Minnesota men, to whom it has been claimed scant justice was done, I shall add a brief statement.

Commissioner Jacobson's contribution was very valuable. He and D. P. O'Neil were there with 50 samples of wheat, 50 samples of flour made therefrom, and baking samples. This was very fortunate, because President Ladd's miller was sick and he was unable to bring any.

The hearing was something like a court proceeding. First came the evidence, which took up to about 3.30 p. m. to present. In this the men who had just come from the West took part—President Ladd and Commissioner of Railroads Candohl for North Dakota; Commissioner Jacobson, of the Railroad Commission; D. P. O'Neil, of the Board of Grain Appeals; John M. Anderson, president Equity Cooperative Exchange; H. N. Owen, publisher Farm, Stock, and Home, for Minnesota; and Railroad Commissioners Murphy and Raish for South Dakota. Montana also got in here. While the governor was not sent an invitation, CARL W. RIDDICK, the wide-awake and energetic Congressman from that State, was on hand and gave valuable information as to the character of wheat grown upon his own farm and as to the size and character of wheat crop grown throughout Montana. Of course, the chief features of this part of the proceedings were President Ladd and Commissioner Jacobson.

Then followed the argument, Mr. Barnes, sitting as a judge, and his vice presidents and directors sitting about him, forming the jury. This was easy for HALVOR STEENERSON, celebrated on both sides of the Red River for the winning of jury trials. He drove the arguments home. Congressmen BAER and SINCLAIR knew their subject and made strong arguments. SYDNEY ANDERSON, who helped both Hoover and Barnes draft legislation during the past three years, naturally got a good hearing from Mr. Barnes. Mr. VOLSTEAD, Minnesota, fresh from his battle to strike down John Barleycorn, was there to plead for wheat.

The decision of Mr. Barnes, United States Wheat Director, who treated our delegation with the very greatest courtesy, is contained in the following telegram:

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 27, 1919.

Congressman GEORGE M. YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

After two days of consideration of the problem raised in respect to this year's crop by the large percentage of the crop suffering from the effects of adverse weather during the growing season, the Grain Corporation is to-night issuing through its various zone offices to the 20,000 licensed buyers of wheat from the producers a complete scale of discounts for lower grades of wheat. These discounts are calculated to give the producer the benefit of every doubt as to the relative value of lightweight wheats in order to protect as far as possible those producers in wide sections that have suffered unfavorable crop developments with the production of an unusual quantity of lower grade wheat. This scale is effective September 2, and all dealers will be required to pay producers not less than the proper country point reflection of the terminal guaranteed price for No. 1 wheat and with the relation for other grades, as follows:

Grain Corporation buying scale grade discounts No. 2 wheat 3 cents under No. 1.
No. 3 wheat 3 cents under No. 2.
No. 4 wheat 4 cents under No. 3.
No. 5 wheat 4 cents under No. 4.

For all wheat otherwise conforming to the specifications of No. 5 or better, but deficient in test weight, discount No. 5 price 3 cents for each 1 pound deficiency in test. Wheat grading below No. 5 for reasons other than deficiency in test weight shall be bought on its relative merits. Smutty wheat to be discounted from 2 cents for slightly smutty to larger discounts, according to degree of smut. Mixed wheat will be taken at discounts ranging from 2 to 5 cents, according to quality, in the judgment of each vice president. Mixed wheat and rye grading mixed grain will be discounted as follows: Estimate the average value of the wheat and rye separately at their proper value and in their proper proportion (figuring the rye at 60 pounds per bushel), make allowance for dockage or other inseparable foreign material, and make such deduction as seems justified, but not less than 5 cents per bushel as a penalty for the mixtures. Garlicey wheat to be discounted 2 cents.

SMITH,
Secretary to Wheat Director.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

DAMAGES BY FIRE, ROSEBUD INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 396) to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, who is in charge of this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is a bill that comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY].

Mr. BLANTON. I understand it is to reimburse for damages by reason of prairie fires or through the alleged negligence of Indian agents?

Mr. GANDY. If the gentleman will permit me to make a brief statement——

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to one matter. The only evidence whatever submitted by the committee in their report as to the amount of damages sustained is the allegation that there was a report filed with the Secretary by the reservation farmer and stock detective in that community at that time. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the reservation farmer and stock detective are friends and neighbors of the alleged injured parties. Their sympathies naturally are with their neighbors. A report of their neighbor's loss could very easily be influenced by their friendship and interest in their neighbor. They are not testifying; they are just merely sending in a report to the Secretary that a certain alleged loss occurred. It does seem to me that when Congress is asked to pay out the money of the people of the United States upon claims that there ought to be evidence of a conclusive nature——

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. There ought to be conclusive evidence submitted at least to the committee if not to the membership of the House. Now, I have waded through this report looking for such evidence. I take it that if there had been any such evidence submitted to the committee it would have been incorporated in the report. There is absolutely no evidence whatever as to the amount of damages other than the mere recitation that the reservation farmer and stock detective sent in a report.

Mr. GANDY. Now will the gentleman permit?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GANDY. The Rosebud Reservation embraces about 7,000 square miles. The people there have nothing whatever to do with the employment of any reservation employees. They are selected by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. These two men who made the investigation of the damages caused by this fire were Interior Department employees, and not selected by the people locally. After the fire occurred it was directed that an investigation be made, and the commissioner approved the report. That is the best evidence there is. I want to say in addition to that——

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever made any attempt to go upon a burnt meadow to determine the value of the hay crop that has been in windrows on that area that was destroyed, and no evidence there except a few charred ashes? Could he determine that with any degree of definiteness such as should be given?

Mr. GANDY. The hay was in stack.

Mr. BLANTON. No; some of it was in windrows, so the report says.

Mr. GANDY. I think the gentleman is right; there was a little bit in windrows, but for the most part it was in stacks. When this claim was presented to me I went to the Rosebud Reservation and, so far as I was able several years after the fire occurred, I made an investigation. The people who have claims involved in this general item are people of responsibility, well-to-do folks, and certainly with hay at $2.50 a ton there is not any disposition to "job" the Government or anybody else.

Mr. BLANTON. Hay in windrows sometimes, when a big cloud is up above, could be sold in my country very readily at $2.50 a ton, if they thought a rain was surely coming that would destroy it.

Mr. GANDY. Just a minute. The hay in stack was at $2.50 a ton, while the windrow hay was at 75 cents a ton.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman this for information? The reservation farmer is an Indian, is he not?

Mr. GANDY. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. He is not an Indian?

Mr. GANDY. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this stock detective an Indian?

Mr. GANDY. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they not selected from the tribe?

Mr. GANDY. They are not; they are selected by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. The district farmer is an Indian?

Mr. GANDY. He is not. He is selected under civil-service regulations?

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any difference in class or position between the district farmer and the reservation farmer, both of which terms are used in this report?

Mr. GANDY. Yes; there is, because——

Mr. BLANTON. They are different men?

Mr. GANDY. They are different men; there is the reservation farmer located at the agency, whereas the district farmer, commonly known as the boss farmer, is located at various points over the reservation. The Indians or people on the reservation have nothing whatever to do with the selection of any of them. They are selected from the civil-service eligible list.

Mr. BLANTON. This final question: This loss was occasioned, undoubtedly, through the negligence of the Indians working under the district farmer in burning fire guards. The fire guards were being burned for the protection of the Indians. They were under the control of the Indians in a large measure. The report says that this particular Rosebud Tribe has funds of its own in trust here with the Government. Now, if this loss was a result of their negligence, why should not their funds be used to settle these claims and not the general funds of the people of the United States?

Mr. GANDY. I will be glad to answer the gentleman on that point. This fire guard was burned under orders not of the reservation farmer but of the reservation agent, by employees under his direction. While the fire guard was being burned the wind came up and it got beyond control and destroyed a lot of property. The man who gave the order was an employee of the United States. These Indians had no more to do with his selection than you have, and there is no more reason why their funds should be used to make up damages that were caused by an error in judgment in burning the fire on that particular day by that agent than your funds should be used. He was your employee as much as he was their employee. He did not represent the Indians; he represented the United States Government.

Mr. WELLING. In maintaining an agent they are carrying out the stipulation of a treaty between the Government and the Indians?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 396) to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named corporation and persons, their legal representatives or heirs, the respective amounts as follows: The Mission Farm Co., $1,835; Peter Volondra, $187.50; M. E. Robertson, $62.50; E. E. Bead, $187.50; James V. Satra, $75; Cash Rogers, $255; Ed Neiness, $87.50; Jacob Hempel, $22.50; Isiah Davis, $187.80; Alvin Hoffman, $50; Louis Bordeaux, $1,385; Charley Pavlik, $50; George W. Coleman, $875; W. S. Hatten, $200; Frank Rothleutner and George W. Coleman, $750; Hugh Coleman, $54.50; and Charles Kolkofen, $62.50 for damages caused to each of said parties by a certain fire set by the carelessness of the employees of the Government in the regular line of their duty and as incident thereto in the Indian Service on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota, and across the State line in Nebraska, on the 20th day of October, 1909.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANK S. INGALLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls.

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Frank S. Ingalls, late United States surveyor general for Arizona, are hereby directed to credit the account of said Frank S. Ingalls with the sum of $36, which amount was paid by him to the Star Corral, Phoenix, Ariz., on account of an injury to one of its saddle horses while being used on October 14, 1912, by an employee of the United States, the payment of which sum was disallowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

W. T. DINGLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 974) for the relief of W. T. Dingler.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD and Mr. BLANTON reserved the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the right to object to the bill for the purpose of asking the author of the bill and those making the report concerning the seeming inconsistency between the language in the bill and the language of the report. The amount, $60.63, is immaterial, but the bill provides that this is to be paid to the bondsman to cover a loss occasioned by the destroying of the post office at Zebulon, Ark., by cyclone on April 29, 1909, whereas it appears in the report that they did have a cyclone out there, and that after the cyclone the postal funds were audited and found to be $60.63 short. Now, there is no averment that the shortage was caused by the cyclone. Unless it was, I see no reason why we would establish a precedent here to relieve people from their bond obligations.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will read the testimony, he will find these facts: That in the spring of 1909, 11 years ago, a very violent cyclone struck over that territory. The postmistress, a very aged lady, and her assistant were seriously injured. Nothing was left of the post office except an indication of where the building had formerly stood. The supplies were scattered to the four ends of the earth. Some of them were gathered up here and there, and they asked Mr. Dingler to take charge, and he did so, and a short time afterwards an inspector came along and checked up and found that there was a shortage in the postage stamps. He gathered up all he could and the neighbors picked up all they could find. There was no question but that was the cause of the loss. The postmistress was in a condition where she could not be consulted. The Post Office inspector advised the claimant that the Government would reimburse him for the loss if the postmistress made a formal claim, and so he paid it out of his own pocket. Before the postmistress became able to attend to any business at all, the six months required by law had expired. No question has ever been raised other than that of time of filing claim. There is no question at the Post Office Department but that the stamps were blown away and lost in the cyclone.

Mr. GARD. The question did arise in my mind as to whether there was any difference between that which the report characterizes as shortage; in other words, was there any action on the part of the——

Mr. WINGO. It was not a shortage in the technical sense that there was a defalcation—it was a loss by cyclone.

Mr. GARD. Was there any action on the part of persons having charge of the post office which caused the shortage, or was the shortage due to this cyclone?

Mr. WINGO. The cyclone blew the supplies away, and they gathered up all they could of them, and found that there were $60.63 of stamps lost.

Mr. GARD. I notice the report says that the report of the inspector who investigated has been carefully examined, but nothing which by the most liberal interpretation can be construed as a claim for credit can be found.

Mr. WINGO. That is as to time. There was a claim made in November for the loss, which occurred in the preceding April, but the department claimed that, it having been made in eight months instead of six months afterwards, it could not be allowed. That is the reason why it has come here. If the claim had reached the departemnt two months earlier, it would have been allowed and paid. Under the law the department can not allow a claim unless made in six months after loss.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman states that there was no shortage other than that caused by the cyclone?

Mr. WINGO. It was a loss caused by the cyclone blowing the stamps away.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, neither the gentleman from Ohio, who is a distinguished ex-jurist, nor the gentleman from Arkansas, who is usually very critical, have called to the attention of the House the only objectionable feature about this bill. When this loss occurred the Post Office Department called on the post office for a report of any loss. Now, my friend from Arkansas may say that the postmistress was hurt and in bed. That may be, but there was somebody under the direction of this bondsman in charge of that office, running it as a temporary postmaster at least. The department shows that immediately after this loss, after hearing of the cyclone, they called on that office for a report of loss, and eight long months elapsed without any report of any claim whatever of damage or loss. For eight months not a single scratch of a pen was sent to the department here in Washington claiming any loss. But later on, when an auditor was sent there and checked up the accounts and checked up the stamps and postal receipts, he found them $60.63 short, and when he reported a shortage, then eight months after this cyclone, eight months after the department had called for a report of loss, the bondsman, whether he was forced to do it or not, paid this shortage. That is the only serious objection. If there was evidence, regardless of that, showing a reasonable explanation for not reporting the loss to the department under those circumstances, then this bill should be allowed, but if there is no reasonable explanation of it, then I take it that it raises a serious objection.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. Admitting the position of the gentleman from Texas is correct, does it make any difference, with respect to the technical question that he raises, if, as a matter of fact, the stamps were blown away and the temporary postmaster who took charge as a surety paid the $60 out of his own pocket to the Government? If it was proper to permit the post office to be reimbursed, why should he not get back his $60?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] is simply stating the point I made. If, as a matter of fact, there was a loss; if, as a matter of fact, this $60 shortage was occasioned by reason of a cyclone and the stamps were blown away, well and good. It ought to be paid for, even after eight months had elapsed and the payment was demanded by the department. The point I made was that under the circumstances of this case there should be some definite conclusive evidence here before the committee and before Congress to the effect that the $60 claim, which went eight months without report after the loss was admitted, was an actual loss, the result of a cyclone, and was not the result of a shortage.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman failed to hear my explanation. The fact is shown by the report of the inspector himself, who did not go there until several months afterwards, as the gentleman suggests, and audit it. He did not go there for the reason that the department was advised formally of the loss, but he was advised by the postmaster of an adjoining town, and a post-office inspector will take knowledge of any loss of a postmaster in his district when he makes his rounds. He got there a month after the loss. The gentleman asks why was not the claim made before eight months had elapsed? This man paid on demand.

The truth of the matter is that those people were up there in the mountains when the post office was destroyed and the whole place blown away, and this man Dingler took charge of the office as a matter of duty, forgetting the fact that he was a bondsman. He was the only one left uninjured. The postmistress and her assistant hung between life and death for several months. When the inspector came around in a few months he checked up the accounts and found that there was a loss of $60 and some odd cents in the stamps, and then Mr. Dingler immediately paid that to the inspector upon the assurance of the post-office inspector that as soon as the postmistress got able to make a claim and showed that the loss was caused by a cyclone he would be reimbursed.

The letter from the department was sent not to Mr. Dingler but to the postmistress, who lay between life and death. Mr. Dingler never had his attention called to the matter. He knew nothing about the postal laws, but after the postmistress had recovered sufficiently and her attention was called to the matter, eight months after the loss, she put in a claim. Mr. Dingler thought it would be taken care of. He did not know of the six months' limitation. When the claim was made by the postmistress and she had become able to make a statement and make a claim in her own name, the department had to rule.

If the gentleman will read the report of the Postmaster General, he will see that the fact is shown there that the postmistress was badly injured at the time, and after her attention was called to it a claim was made, but it was not made until January 6, 1910.

Mr. BLANTON. This is from the Postmaster General himself. He says:

> On May 22, 1909, this department was advised of the casualty, but was not informed of any loss of Government funds or postage stamps; and on the same day an inquiry on this subject was addressed to the postmaster, but no reply has ever been received. The first intimation that reached the department that a loss had occurred for which the postmaster desired credit in her account was contained in a letter dated January 6, 1910, more than eight months after the loss.

Mr. WINGO. She was unable to respond to the formal notice. She could not answer the letter because she was unconscious, but as soon as she was able she wrote and asked for credit. She was not able to make a claim until eight months, and as a matter of fact the poor woman did not recover, but finally died.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $60.63 to W. T. Dingler, the amount paid by him as bondsman for postmistress at Zebulon, Ark., to cover loss occasioned by the destroying of the post office by cyclone April 29, 1909.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLEVELAND TRINIDAD PAVING CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5238) for the relief of the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may we have the bill reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co., of Cuyahoga County, Cleveland, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,017 for money paid by it to the United States for the right to remove sand from a certain tract of land reserved for Cheyenne and Arapahoe school purposes, said right being granted in March, 1910, by the Department of the Interior, acting through William B. Freer, Indian agent at Darlington, Okla., said right to expire in December, 1912. Said land, owing to a mistake in the description and despite the fact that the General Land Office at Washington had directed that it be reserved from sale, was placed on sale on November 15, 1910, under instructions of the Department of the Interior, and the tract which had been leased to the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co. was sold to Archibald Mauerer.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On line 7, page 1, strike out the figures "$3,017" and insert in lieu thereof "$775."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, it may be that, in the absence of the gentleman who is the author of the bill, the bill should be passed over without prejudice, but——

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I notice not only the gentleman who introduced the bill is absent, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR], who prepared the report, is also absent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

CLARA A. KANE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6413) granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as the result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

The title of the bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to which I gave very careful consideration in the last term of Congress and filed a minority report, in which I set forth that it should be reduced to $480, because under the evidence submitted the amount of compensation could not under any circumstances amount to more than $480. Would the gentleman——

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Texas I would like to state that the committee gave Mrs. William A. Yenser, the aunt, a full year's pay, as was customary. But if the gentleman wishes to raise that objection I am perfectly willing to reduce the amount to $480.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman states he will reduce it to $480 I will not object.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Why should the chairman of this committee yield this question under the circumstances? If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] wants to make a motion to amend and reduce the amount, let him do it and reduce the amount, and let this poor woman get $480 instead of $549, which this committee found her entitled to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He will not let it come up.

Mr. BEE. Let the responsibility rest where it belongs.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state that I am not contentious in this matter, as my colleague [Mr. BEE] would seem to insinuate; but his statement shows that he is not quite as familiar with this bill as I am, for in the claim that this good woman filed with the committee she asked for only $480. The chairman of the Committee on Claims, Mr. EDMONDS, will admit that this woman asked for only $480. Yet in the face of that the committee have increased the amount and seek to give her more than she asked from the Government. Now, if my colleague thinks I am going to sit here quietly and let that kind of a transaction pass, wasting the public money out of the Treasury, without raising my voice against it, he is mistaken and he does not know me.

On January 14, 1918, I submitted to the House the following minority report, which is printed in Report No. 652, to wit:

[Report No. 652, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

CLARA KANE.

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

This is a case where my colleagues on the committee, through the favorable majority report, seek to pay to claimant $69.12 more than she asks. Under the law she is entitled to nothing, and has no legal claim against the Government. Whether she is paid anything depends entirely upon the Government's bounty. She asks for only $480. The bill (H. R. 6406) was introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress to pay her $480. In her letter dated February 28, 1916, addressed to Congressman WILLIAM S. VARE, she, Clara Kane, states:

"William Yenser, the deceased, contributed an average of a little over $10 per week, but I returned to him sufficient to buy his clothes from the amount he contributed, leaving a net balance of $480 for the past year. As you will see, this shows that he spent about $50 or $60 for clothes, and I did not feel that I was entitled or should ask for that which he had spent on his clothes, and confined myself to the actual net amount received.

"Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,

"Very truly, yours, "Mrs. CLARA KANE."

William Yenser received only $1.76 per day. If he spent $50 or $60 per year on clothes he could not have contributed even $480 net per year to Mrs. Kane, for he had to have food, and a year's food must have cost him or Mrs. Kane something.

But in the face of the above evidence the committee, with that liberality for which it is noted, recommends that Congress pay more than the claimant desires, and that she be given $549.12 instead of the $480. Mrs. Kane was related to William Yenser neither by affinity nor consanguinity. I respectfully submit that this allowance should be reduced to $480, the full amount asked for.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Under the law this claimant is entitled to nothing. To be legally entitled to anything, she would have to be the mother of the said William Yenser, and even if she were his mother she would then be entitled only to such part of his salary for one year as he usually contributed to her support.

His yearly earnings amounted to only $549.12, out of which it is admitted that he supported himself and only contributed part to Mrs. Kane.

The following is Mrs. Kane's statement of her claim, wherein she shows that under no circumstances would she be entitled to more than $480, and she only asks for that sum of $480; yet this committee and my colleague from Texas [Mr. BEE] are so liberal with the public money of the people that they seek to give here $69.12 more than she wants. It is not so much the insignificant amount involved, but the precedent we will set by such action, and unless the chairman will assure me that he will reduce this amount down to $480 in the passage of this bill I shall be compelled to object to its consideration under this unanimous-consent rule.

MRS. KANE'S STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of February 16, in reference to the Clara Kane matter, beg to say that the amount of $480 claimed as compensation is made up as follows:

William Yenser, the deceased, contributed an average of a little over $10 per week, but Mrs. Kane returned him sufficient to buy his clothes from the amount he contributed, leaving a net balance of $480 for the past year.

As you will see, this shows that he spent about $50 or $60 for clothes, and she did not feel that she was entitled or should ask for that which he had spent on his clothes and confined herself to the actual net amount received.

Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,
Very truly, yours, Mrs. CLARA KANE.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, unless the chairman of the committee will assure me that he will reduce the amount to $480.

Mr. EDMONDS. It has been customary in the case of the death of an employee to give one year's pay. The year's pay of this man was $549.20. The aunt of the man, the only person to whom this money could be paid, agreed that he spent a certain amount of money during the year for clothes, and that deducting that amount from the $549.20 would leave $480, which she claimed ought to be paid to her. Now, if the gentleman is going to object, then, rather than postpone the claim any longer, it having been here for a number of years, I will move to make the amount $480, and let the poor woman get that much.

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, is this a claim that accrued before the passage of the compensation act?

Mr. EDMONDS. No. The situation is this: This man was never legally adopted by his aunt, but was raised from a small child by her. The Government would not pay any compensation to her under the general law, on account of the fact that she was not his mother and that she had never legally adopted him.

Mr. BLACK. She did not come within the terms of the law.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is correct. Now, we are trying to put her in the same position as a parent.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the law she could not collect anything, because the only person who could collect it would be the boy's mother; but this good woman was a foster mother to him. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state that he will move to reduce the amount to $480.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Under that assurance, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me that a rather more serious question arises than the one suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I am sure the House would not quarrel over giving this poor woman this additional $60, but, in fact, would be glad to do it if, under the circumstances, they could. But what seems to me to be the question involved here is whether we are to depart from the rules of the law and pass this bill for the benefit of a woman with whom this man was living and to whom he paid board all the time, there being absolutely no relationship between the two except the boy came there at an early date and lived there all of his life, but there was no action of a court which would make her his foster mother or anything of that kind.

Mr. EDMONDS. The woman was the boy's aunt, and he never knew any other parent. That is shown by the testimony before the committee.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to the bill, and I realize that everybody in the House will be glad to see this poor woman get this money, or whatever money would compensate her properly for the death of his man who helped her; but the danger is that when we go outside the law and say that because a man lives with his aunt a certain number of years the aunt shall be compensated in the event of his death, we throw wide the door to those who under the general law may be properly compensated for his death, assuming that it was caused without negligence on his part.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that this will not throw open the door, because it will be absolutely necessary for every claim of this character to take the same course; and goodness knows that it takes years to get one of these claims through the Claims Committee.

Mr. GARD. What I am trying to convey to the gentleman is that such safeguards should be thrown around it that we should not pay this claim and at the same time pay compensation to somebody else under the general law.

Mr. EDMONDS. There has been no compensation paid under the general law or any other law, and under the general law there is nobody in this case to whom compensation could be paid.

Mr. GARD. I understand that; but the report and the bill and everything connected with it should show affirmatively that there is no person standing in the relationship of dependency which under the law would entitle them to payment under our compensation act. Even if the man were married, of course the Congress could pass this private bill, but it would not be wise to establish that precedent. If he had a child, the child would be entitled to compensation under our general compensation law. We could pass this bill for the benefit of the woman who had reared him and taken care of him, but it would be an unwise precedent, however sympathetic we might be in that condition of affairs. What I am trying to get to the gentleman is to have set forth in the bill and report the fact that this payment is all there is to be made; that there is nobody else who can come in under the general compensation law and get compensation for his death.

Mr. BABKA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BABKA. The report shows that there is such an affidavit.

Mr. GARD. What affidavit?

Mr. BABKA. The affidavit of Elmer Kane, on page 3 of the report.

Mr. GARD (reading)—

That at the time of the death of the said William A. Yenser he had no living relatives besides the said Clara Kane, his adopted mother, with whom he was living and to whose support he was contributing.

A subsequent affidavit by Elizabeth Collins, while it is in the identical form, establishes the idea of which I spoke.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read for amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move, in line 5, page 1, the sum of $549.12 be stricken out and $480 inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out $549.12 and insert $480.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To ask the chairman of the committee a question in relation to the amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. How did it happen that the larger amount was put in?

Mr. EDMONDS. That represents one year's pay. It has been customary for the committee to give one year's pay.

Mr. CALDWELL. One year's pay was $549.12.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. How did it happen that the original claim was only $480?

Mr. EDMONDS. The aunt, the claimant, said that he spent the difference between those two sums in clothing and she thought that he was not entitled to that difference. She got that much money from him every year and he kept the balance for his clothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was being taken when Mr. BLANTON made the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. CALDWELL. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands tellers, and those in favor of ordering tellers will rise. One hundred and thirteen Members have arisen, a quorum is present, and tellers are ordered. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] will take their places as tellers.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. But tellers have been ordered.

Mr. HICKS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. Can not the mover of the motion for tellers obtain unanimous consent to withdraw his demand?

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been ordered, and the Chair thinks the vote must be taken by tellers.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, the point of no quorum was made while the Chair was counting, and the gentleman from New York then asked for tellers. A quorum was discovered and then he withdrew his demand for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that tellers having been ordered the vote should now be taken by tellers.

Mr. FESS. What is the vote on?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 4 and noes 77.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and nine Members present. The tellers reported 4 ayes and 77 noes, so the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JAMES M. MOORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1812) making appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection until I can make a statement?

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my friend from Oklahoma that I could have prevented the last bill from coming up, but I had a distinct agreement with the chairman of the committee that in passing the last bill he would assure me that he would reduce the amount to $480 which the claimant wanted, and asked for. No one has given this bill closer investigation than the chairman and myself, and in overriding our agreement, I feel that the House did not keep faith with me and therefore on other bills coming up I do not think that they should come up when we can not depend upon an agreement made between the chairman and a Member, especially when by objecting that Member could prevent the bill from coming up. I shall therefore object to other bills being considered now as several are wholly unmeritorious.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Did not the chairman of the Committee on Claims keep his agreement?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I suppose the gentleman has a bill that he wants passed. The House did not carry out the agreement that I made with the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection or make it?

Mr. BLANTON. I make it.

Mr. HASTINGS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to make an inquiry as to whether or not I can now object to every other bill on the calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order for any Member to object to the bills as they come up.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman wants to adopt the dog in the manger policy, all right.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from Minnesota need not try to be facetious. Although he is frequently out of order, we are nevertheless operating under the rules of the House, whereby under unanimous consent a Member can prevent legislation from being considered, when it becomes apparent to him that same is to be hurriedly passed without argument, investigation, or deliberate consideration, and through my objections I will keep some very unmeritorious bills from passing this evening.

E. T. THING AND S. A. THING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1853) to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

CARLOW AVELLINA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5665) for the relief of Carlow Avellina.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

REIMBURSEMENT ON ACCOUNT OF LOSS OF FIREARMS, ETC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 253) for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by United States troops during the labor strike in the State of Colorado in 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. POU. Upon the subject of the opportunity that Members have to get through bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FARMERS NATIONAL BANK OF WILKINSON, IND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the Farmers' National Bank, of Wilkinson, Ind.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to learn whether this calendar is to be objected to seriatim, as a whole, or are we to proceed with the orderly conduct of business. It is exceedingly difficult to get the Private Calendar up for consideration, and I trust that gentlemen on both sides and every one may maintain good temper, so that we may conduct the public business. We gain nothing by interruptions. We gain nothing by objections not sanctioned by merit, and I am hopeful that we may return to these bills that have been objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair can not be advised in advance as to any action in interference with the orderly process of business until each bill is called up.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state for the benefit of the House—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Where a bill on the Private Calendar is objected to, does it lose its place on the calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it does not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, under the agreement under which we are operating any gentleman in the House, on his responsibility as a Member, has the right to object to the consideration of a bill. I do not think it seemly or proper for gentlemen to question the motive of such objection. If an objection is made, I think we should then pass to the next bill. We are operating under an agreement under which any bill objected to is passed over. I think we will make the best progress if we good-naturedly proceed to the consideration of the measures that are not objected to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I do not care to indulge in that summum bonum of feminine felicity "I told you so," but is not this a repetition of the same old performance to which I called the gentleman's attention this morning?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order. The gentleman from Wyoming has yielded to him.

Mr. WINGO. I was in order. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is the only one who is out of order, as usual.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a few moments ago charged me with bad faith in the passage of an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I did not charge the chairman with bad faith. The chairman kept faith with me.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am very glad to know that. Of course I have no right to speak for the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I said that the House had not kept faith with the agreement that the chairman had made with me, when the chairman and I agreed that the amendment would be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MRS. THOMAS M'GOVERN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5348) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the only objection that I have made to any bill on this calendar—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects and the Clerk will report the next bill.

HEIRS OF ROBERT LAIRD M'CORMICK, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6289) for the relief of the heirs of Robert Laird McCormick, deceased.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I move that the committe do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw that——

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PERRY E. BORCHERS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 646) for the relief of Perry E. Borchers because of losses suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox, while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the obstructive methods pursued by the gentleman from Texas in regard to legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Move it!

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

AMHERST W. BARBER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1377) for the relief of Amherst W. Barber.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] be allowed to address the House for five minutes on the question of obstruction of legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against the request, Mr. Chairman. It is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have ruled it out of order in spite of the point made by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understood that the Chair said that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] was out of order. If the committee now rises, would not the motion then be in order in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. No; not at all. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JAMES A. SHOWEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 946) for the relief of James A. Showen.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. MACCRATE. I desire to ask——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Do not break the unbroken record of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MACCRATE. Does a bill for the relief of the father of a dead soldier come under the same unanimous-consent objection as any other bill? This is a bill for the relief of the father of a dead soldier who died in the line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question for the gentleman from Texas and not the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. If after the next bill has been read and I should get recognition from the Chair before the gentleman from Texas could beat me to it, would the gentleman from Texas, while I have been recognized by the Chair, have the right to interpose an objection until I would get through?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be unable to recognize the gentleman if the gentleman from Texas makes objection to the consideration of the bill, because then there is nothing to discuss.

Mr. KEARNS. But my parliamentary inquiry is, if I could obtain recognition from the Chair before the gentleman from Texas had reached the ear of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be bound to recognize the gentleman from Texas to object to the consideration of a bill, because that is the only subject before the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose I would be recognized by the Chair and I should reserve the right to object and had the floor, would the gentleman from Texas be able to take me off my feet?

The CHAIRMAN. He would.

Mr. KEARNS. Then another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. Can the gentleman from Texas object to the consideration of any bill without recognition from the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require recognition except that the Chair is bound to recognize anyone who makes an objection under the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KEARNS. Another parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. Does not the rule require before any man can get the floor on any propositon he must be recognized by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will state to his colleague that we are proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement to consider bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to, and therefore the Chair would have to recognize anyone who objects.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OSCAR SMITH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 644) for the relief of Oscar Smith.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. If anyone on the floor of the House desires to make a point of order is it not necessary before he can interpose that point of order to receive recognition from the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair must recognize any gentleman before he can speak on any subject.

Mr. KEARNS. And that rule would apply to the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to say. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order to ask that the action giving the gentleman from Texas 40 minutes next Thursday be rescinded?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KNUTSON. The Chair thinks not, at this time. I propose to make that request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota ought to know it is out of order to ask such a question.

Mr. KNUTSON. If "the gentleman from Minnesota" did not know more than the gentleman from Texas he would resign.

Mr. BLANTON. He would resign to-morrow, then.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Texas a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ELLEN AGNES MONOGUE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 909) for the relief of Ellen Agnes Monogue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. DEWALT. Is it within the province of this committee later to proceed with business by a majority vote, notwithstanding the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; because the committee is now in operation under a unanimous-consent agreement. It would be possible for the committee to rise and make some arrangement.

Mr. DEWALT. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DEWALT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 61.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Inasmuch as I am the author of this bill and am quite familiar with the measure, I want to ask the Chair how the professions of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who has been howling around here for some weeks about the relief of private soldiers, comport with his objection to this bill, which is simply to give to the mother of a deceased private soldier the gratuity that has been given under previous laws of Congress to other mothers of deceased soldiers? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I did not quite catch the reply of the distinguished parliamentarian in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not construe that as a parliamentary inquiry, but no doubt it is a pertinent one.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the Chair propound the inquiry to the gentleman from Texas? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no control over the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. And the gentleman has no control over himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will have control over the gentleman from Minnesota if he keeps butting in. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MRS. MAMIE DUFFER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1266) for the relief of Mrs. Mamie Duffer, of Shannon, Miss.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection for a moment? This bill provides for the insurance of a boy who was killed on the battle field of France.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. KEARNS. To propound another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. I understood the Chair to say a few moments ago, in response to a parliamentary inquiry that I had propounded, that before the gentleman from Texas could call for the regular order it was necessary for him to be recognized by the Chair. Was that right?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Chair ruled that the gentleman from Texas must be recognized first if he desired to object to the present consideration of any bill on this calendar, and no other motion can take him off his feet.

Mr. KEARNS. I understand that. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] asked him to reserve his objection, and he made a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not paying attention to that.

Mr. KEARNS. I want to get straight on that. Has the gentleman from Mississippi the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Mississippi had not gained the floor.

Mr. CANDLER. I suggest to the Chair that I was addressing my request to the gentleman from Texas, asking him to withhold his objection, in view of the fact——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I declined to yield.

Mr. CANDLER. I am talking to the Chair and not to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. GARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GARD. I rise to move that the committee do now rise. We are not getting anywhere and men's minds are getting tangled.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. MAYS. I observed a while ago that the gentleman from Texas threatened the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] with annihilation if he butted in on these proceedings. I desire to know whether any other gentleman is regarded by the gentleman from Texas as an intruder if he takes part in these proceedings?

Mr. BLANTON. No; that was not the case. I just merely told the gentleman from Minnesota to keep off of me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects. This concludes the calendar.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, under the order of the House, I think it was understood that if we had any time left after proceeding with the unobjected to bills, we would go back and take up the other bills. Is not that right?

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. That was not incorporated in the agreement. I ask for the reporter's notes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement it would still be in order for any gentleman to call up a bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair hold that bills having already been objected to up to this time the committee can not now, under the agreement made, proceed to the consideration of other bills?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that inasmuch as the committee has ordered a favorable report on five bills and the others having been objected to, that before the committee rises it will be in order for the chairman of the committee to call up any other bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. Without reference to the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I ask for the reading by the reporter of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. DYER. I make a point of order that that request is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I submit to the Chairman with all due respect that that question was raised by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is out of order.

Mr. KNUTSON. The regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Chairman hold that we can take up other bills on the calendar, even if objected to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has passed upon that question and has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair allow me to speak on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not make the point of order; he can appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the gentleman from Texas state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the committee do anything beyond the power conferred upon it by the House? The House only conferred on the Committee of the Whole, under the request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, permission for it to consider such bills as were unobjected to on the calendar. No request was made to take up other bills.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that so far the gentleman is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit with all due respect that the committee can not go beyond that authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania finally moved to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. He still has the right to call up bills which would not be liable to objection under the rules of the House.

CLEVELAND TRINIDAD PAVING CO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 5238) for the relief of the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Are we proceeding under the general rules of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. We are proceeding to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DUPRÉ. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I observe that the chairman of the committee has called up No. 12 on the calendar, which I assume is the last bill unobjected to. May I ask vicariously of the chairman whether it is his intention to call up the bills seriatim?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will call them up in order.

Mr. DUPRÉ. That will be satisfactory.

JAMES M. MOORE.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call up No. 14 instead of No. 12, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] is absent. I call up the bill (H. R. 1812) making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $840 in payment to James M. Moore, late of Company L, Twenty-eighth Regiment United States Infantry, transferred from Company M, First United States Infantry, for injuries sustained while in the service of the Government in the Philippine Islands as a teamster in a runaway accident on May 12, 1907.

With the following committee amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one hour.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen have asked for time on this bill. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to proceed temperately if I can, but there are times in a man's life when patience ceases to be a virtue. For the last several months I, as a Member of Congress, have patiently sat here and watched the obstructive methods——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking on the bill, and under the rules of the House I submit that he must speak to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas must know that under general debate the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not confined to the subject of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But we are under general debate under the rules of the House, which do not permit any debate other than on the bill under consideration while considering the Private Calendar, and under the rules of this House I respectfully urge the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Chair rule——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is proceeding in order.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, during those several months I have noted not only with considerable displeasure but with exceeding disapprobation the conduct of the gentleman from Texas. I do not propose to question the motives of any man unless he——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please name the gentleman from Texas? There are 18 Members from Texas.

Mr. DEWALT. I have reference to but one Member from Texas who could act in that way, and his name is BLANTON.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's language is disrespectful, is in violation of the rules of this House, and is out of order. I am not going to sit here and permit a Member of Congress, because he is mad, to abuse me, and I am going to hold the gentleman responsible if he attempts to abuse me any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is running perilously close to the line, and the Chair will ask him to proceed in order and not to mention gentlemen by name.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that I am not at all angry. If I were angry I would pursue a method entirely different from that which I am now taking. [Laughter and applause.] I am trying to argue this matter clearly, and I hope effectively, not only for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas, but for the benefit of others who may follow his bad example. I doubt very much whether there are any gentlemen, Members of this House, who would stoop to follow the example that we have seen to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman, and I ask the Chair to protect me from such abuse. If he can not, then I shall protect myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Texas is right in that last remark, and he will ask the gentleman to proceed in order and not to use language which tends to hold a Member of the House in contempt.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will try to proceed in order on a very disorderly subject. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the last remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was absolutely in order.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I remember very well when a certain gentleman from Texas first appeared in the Halls of Congress. It was then cited with great approbation by some and amusement by others that he would see to it that the Congress of the United States, and particularly the House of Representatives, should be at work from 9 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening without cessation. In other words, he attempted by proclamation and declamation, if you please, and not by succinct operation, not by constructive methods, but by destructive methods, to reform what he considered to be the disorderly and negligent conduct of this House; and in spite of that declamation, in spite of that proclamation, that he was determined to see to it that this House did its business, I have sat here day after day and seen the gentleman exercise his right, if you please, in calling for a quorum, thereby consuming the time of this House, 35 and 40 minutes each time, and impeding the business of this great legislative body—and for what good purpose? Was it for the purpose of good legislation? Was it for the purpose of defeating bad legislation? I charge here emphatically that it was for the purpose of the gratification of his own malice in many instances.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask the Chairman to rule on the point of order upon that language, and I ask the Chair to keep the gentleman in order. He is impugning my motives, and I take it that I do not have to quote further to convince the Chair that the gentleman can not pursue that line of argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed in order.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may proceed in order, let me cite the Chair to one instance which happened but a few moments ago, when one gentleman, a Representative from Texas, said to a gentleman who is a Representative from another State in this House, "Unless you keep off me I will take care of you," or words to that effect, and this, if you please, are the exhibitions of the statesmanlike conduct of a man who said that he would come here and keep the House of Representatives in order and compel it to do business in an orderly manner.

What are these objections made to-day? I find upon this calendar 63 bills, almost all of them for the relief of certain parties, most of them, I have no doubt, for beneficial purposes; and among the rest let me cite No. 13 on the calendar, H. R. 6413, granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as the result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. And yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] determines that he will object, without giving any reason, without rhyme or reason. And upon the next page of the calendar I find a bill, H. R. 646, for the relief of Perry E. Borchers, because of loss he suffered, due to destruction of property and termination of contract for services because of smallpox while in the employ of the Navy Department in Cuba. And again I hear the objection of the gentleman from Texas.

Then further down I find a bill to appoint Admiral William S. Benson, United States Navy, and Rear Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy, as permanent admirals in the Navy. And again the patriotic gentleman from Texas interposes an objection to those. Then I find further a bill providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child of Norman Lee Molzahn from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place, and my distinguished friend from Texas, by reason of his position in the House of Representatives, takes upon himself the enormous burden and the great beneficence of saying that he objects to the reinterment of an infant child from its place of burial to another. If that be the conduct of the statesman from Texas, then God save use from such statesmanship! [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as I have done many times before, I again make the point of order.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, there are some——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair rule on my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. That the gentleman impugns my motives, my conduct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in unable to see in the last remark quoted of the gentleman from Pennsylvania any reflection on the gentleman from Texas that is not proper. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit to the Chair that we are presumed to be running under certain rules of the House, and under the rulings of the present occupant of the chair I am helpless.

Mr. KNUTSON. Regular order!

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that those rules apply. Will the Chair permit me to make another point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The gentleman is entitled to make his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I realize I am dealing with a bunch of colleagues who are mad because I have opposed their will, but I have done it under the rules of this House and in the interests of 110,000,000 people of the United States.

Mr DYER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should make the point of order and not a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit to the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. With all due respect, under the rules of the House any Member has a right to object to the consideration of any measure under unanimous-consent calls——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I submit——

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). And not have his motives impugned, and I have only exercised my right as a representative of this Government in objecting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. My point of order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is impugning my motives, and time after time has questioned the action I have taken here, insinuating it was from improper motives entirely, and I submit that it is absolutely improper argument on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled two or three times that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was overstepping the proper limits, but in merely questioning the statesmanship of the gentleman from Texas the Chair does not think he is. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. I would state, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if I have made any mistake at all in regard to alleged statesmanship, I am very willing to beg pardon of the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter.] I will take it all back; but I am very much in doubt now whether the conduct I have described as being pursued by the gentleman from Texas even rises to the dignity of what one might call pothouse politics instead of statesmanship.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order against the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, the Chair thinks, is correct in questioning the language. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is instructed to proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania going to be permitted to continue to disobey the ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. DEWALT. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are certain men who seem to be born with a destructive genius. They never have been able to construct anything, but they have the facility of being able to destroy almost anything that somebody else is endeavoring to construct. It is related of a certain Irishman who was shipwrecked and came near an island that he proclaimed at once, "Have you a government there?" And they replied, "We have." "Well," he said, "I am agin it." It did not make any difference what kind of a government it was, he was against anything that anybody else had or anything that anybody else proposed. Now, there is a limit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as to obstructive and destructive methods of any kind upon this floor, and that limit can only be found in the conscience and the good intentions of the Member himself. And whilst I may have been somewhat harsh in what I said—and I was intentionally harsh, because I meant every word I said—I would now suggest not only to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], but to others who have used obstructive methods by ceaseless objection and by calling for a quorum, that at this time we have far more important measures to attend to than the mere gratification of personal desire, or perhaps, if you please, the exhibition of personal spleen. [Applause.] But, now, this applies not only to the gentleman from Texas. It may perhaps apply to me. I, too, may have been guilty. I do not hold myself above fault, but this I do say for myself, that I have troubled this House very little by proclamation or declamation. I think you will all agree with me on that.

When I have anything to say I try to say it clearly, plainly, and explicitly, and I have tried to say this in the same manner. Further than that, we were cautioned here only a few days ago by the gentleman who leads the minority side of the House, that we have important measures to attend to. We have been cautioned by the respected leader of the majority side of the House in the same way, and in spite of that caution, in spite of the fact that the eminent leaders on both sides have implored the membership of this House to keep on with the legitimate business of this House, in spite of that admonition, 63 bills here will not be able to receive attention except in the regular order, because they have been set aside by paltry objections without foundation or without reason, except what? Except that the gentleman from Texas happened to disagree with the conduct or the action of the committee having those bills in charge.

Now, who suffers? Did the committee suffer, did the chairman of the committee suffer, by this action? No. The people who have these bills for their benefit are the sufferers. And who else suffers? The Congressmen who introduced these bills for their constituents. And yet for the gratification, as I claim, simply of this gentleman's desire to vent a dislike toward the committee—that is the way he expressed it—he halts the progress of all these bills and stops the progress of legislation in this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege, high privilege, of this House. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will state the question of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. My privilege is this, that because under the unanimous-consent rule I have exercised my right to object to consideration of certain bills, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] has impugned my motives, has charged that I was actuated by malice and spleen only, in an effort to vex the committee, to display a want of statesmanship, and to do those things which no good representative of any country would do, and has otherwise brought into question my good faith and my good intentions and my standing as a representative of the people of this country, and has sought to bring me into ridicule of my fellow Members of the House and my fellow countrymen.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that you can not raise a question of personal privilege in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] prepared to state the exact language?

Mr. BLANTON. The exact language was "actuated by spleen" and "actuated by malice" and "desire to vex the committee and the membership."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman presents a question of privilege. The gentleman had his remedy at any time during the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], where he could have had the words taken down. He neglected to do it, and he is not presenting, in the opinion of the Chair, a question of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. The words are a matter of record, besides being within the minds of the Chairman and other Members of the House, and are also a matter of record in the stenographic notes taken in this House, which I ask to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declined to take advantage of his privilege at that time. The Chair does not think he is presenting a question of personal privilege, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where language is used against a Member such as would constitute a question of personal privilege, and a Member makes a point of order against that language, and the Chair sustains the point of order, is not that an evidence of the fact that there was a question of privilege?

The CHAIRMAN. The interests of the gentleman from Texas were in the hands of the committee at all times. Any gentleman could have asked that the words be taken down, and the gentleman from Texas could have done it. The Chair fulfilled his entire duty in cautioning the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] to proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Chair does not want to give me a chance to be heard, all right. It is my duty to respect the ruling of the Chair, whether approved by me or not, and this I do.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Can a question of personal privilege be raised in the Committee of the Whole House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that only and at the time the alleged offensive words were spoken a request could be made to take them down. The Chair does not think the gentleman——

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I ask for a second reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1812) making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $840 in payment to James M. Moore, late of Company L, Twenty-eighth Regiment United States Infantry, transferred from Company M, First United States Infantry, for injuries sustained while in the service of the Government in the Philippine Islands as a teamster, in a runaway accident on May 12, 1907.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "a" and before the word "teamster," insert the word "civilian."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes in defense of myself on the floor of the House.

Mr. KNUTSON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

E. T. THING AND S. A. THING.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee proceed with the consideration of the bill H. R. 1853.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1853) to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses and damages sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1853) to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses and damages sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,072.45, to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing, of the county of Imperial, State of California, for losses and damages sustained by them through the negligence of one of the veterinary inspectors employed by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, in dipping cattle belonging to said E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing, in Imperial County, Calif., on or about the 8th of July, 1915, said sum to be paid to said E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing in full for all losses and damages so sustained by them.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$1,072.45" and insert in lieu thereof "$698.40."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to inquire in what respect this case differs from other cases in which cattle are injured while being dipped for ticks? It is a very common occurrence. There are millions of cases of cattle being killed or injured while being dipped, and I am wondering whether we are setting a precedent for the payment of damages for all of them?

Mr. EDMONDS. We are only paying for the cattle killed on account of dipping, and not for those that were injured.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This dipping is done by officials in the States Relations Service. Injury and death of cattle while being dipped are very frequent. It happens that almost every time cattle are dipped there are some that are more or less injured. And if we establish a precedent of paying for them in usual or ordinary cases, such as we have all the time, we will have a multitude of such claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will let the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] answer. He is more conversant with the subject than I am.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to know wherein this case may be differentiated from other cases in which cattle are killed or injured while being dipped?

Mr. BEE. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I understand this is not an ordinary case of injury of cattle from dipping, but a case where there is proven negligence on the part of the Government agent who administered the dipping in putting too strong a solution in the liquid in which the cattle were dipped, which is admitted by all the officers of the Government, and which was done under circumstances where the man owning the cattle was compelled to submit.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Was this done by the States Relations Service under the act by which aid is given to the States to eradicate the cattle tick? Under that law the States appoint agents to have charge of the work. They construct vats and supervise the dipping and act generally under laws passed by the State legislatures, which laws require the people to drive their cattle to these vats periodically for dipping. Is this that kind of a case?

Mr. BEE. This is a case of dipping cattle by the agents of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Did an inspector appointed by the Department of Agriculture dip the cattle?

Mr. BEE. The cattle were dipped by an inspector from Washington. This happened in the State of California. I have no interest whatever in the matter, but it was a bill introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER], and I reported it out of the committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Was the dipping compulsory under the laws of California?

Mr. BEE. Yes; under the laws of the United States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But there is no law of the United States which compels men to dip their cattle. In the State of Alabama we have, I imagine, exactly the same situation as they have in California, and as I presume they have in 20 of the States of the Union, especially throughout the South and Southwest. There are constant complaints coming on account of the negligent construction of these dipping vats, of poison from the solution in which the cattle are dipped, from allowing the cattle to drink of the liquid, causing their death, and so on. The mail of every southern Member of Congress is full of complaints about the tick-dipping laws. It strikes me there should be some features in this case which distinguish it from other cases. Otherwise we shall have a vast number of just such claims as this presented here. If we pay one of these claims, we must pay them all. No other course would be fair. If the Federal Government is to assume liability for all damage done to cattle while dipping them, very good, but my people who have such claims must be put on an equality with others.

Mr. BEE. I will yield to my colleague from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] has the floor.

Mr. BEE. He yielded to me.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In reply to the gentleman from Alabama, I will say there is a rule that the Secretary of Agriculture enforces in Texas, whereby the Federal Government can take your cattle and dip them under the quarantine law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We simply give financial aid to the States for the eradication of ticks. No Federal law is violated by failing to dip. The only compulsion is under State laws. No Federal officer can take cattle without the owner's consent and dip them. Why, then, should the Government be held liable for damage done while dipping? The Government generously donates some money to help a State get rid of cattle ticks, and behold a claim for damages comes because some State inspector was at fault in connection with the dipping. This looks funny to me.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The Federal officers are dipping cattle in Texas to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] to lay the bill aside with favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to.

CARLOW AVELLINA.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee take up for consideration the bill H. R. 5665.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5665) for the relief of Carlow Avellina.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard in opposition to this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That will come later. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before that, I wish to be heard in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is too late. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk is now reading the bill for amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Carlow Avellina, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,320 as compensation for damages sustained by him when an aeroplane of the Air Mail Service descended on his property in August, 1918.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 1, line 6, strike out the figures "$1,320" and insert in lieu thereof "$500."

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been no general debate on this bill whatever. I submit to the Chair that it is improper to take up the bill except after general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS]. He has an hour. He did not use his hour. The gentleman from Texas was careless, evidently, and did not use his hour. The Chair can not undertake to make rules for the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish to submit an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be in order.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I desire to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why does not the gentleman do it?

Mr. BLANTON. I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, to strike out, on page 1, line 6, "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$100."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that, that the amendment is not in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KNUTSON. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to lay the bill aside with favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 116, noes 3.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

LOSS OF FIREARMS AND AMMUNITION IN COLORADO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee take up for consideration Private Calendar No. 17, being S. 253, for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill a second time for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $7,800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available and to remain available until June 30, 1920, for payment of claims on account of loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops from civilians in the State of Colorado during the labor-strike troubles which occurred in the calendar year 1914: Provided, That settlement of such claims shall be made by the Auditor for the War Department upon the approval and recommendation of the Secretary of War, where the amount of the loss has been ascertained by the War Department, and payment thereof will be accepted by the owners of the property in full satisfaction of such claims.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out, in line 3, page 1, the figures "$7,800" and to insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,319.64."

I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman, in accordance with a statement contained in a letter from the Secretary of War to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] which shows that the War Department has a record of the loss of property by citizens of Colorado under this claim to the amount of $5,319.64. If that is not the right amount, I will ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HARDY] to correct me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 3, strike out the figures "$7,800" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$5,319.64."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question or two. Were United States troops mixed up in the strike riots out in Colorado?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. In 1914, when the strikes and riots occurred in Colorado, United States troops were sent out there.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who sent them?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. The President of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the governor of Colorado make any request on the Government of the United States, stating that Colorado was not competent to attend to its own business and that it needed these troops?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Unfortunately that is the case. For several months United States troops were in charge of a number of districts and martial law was in force. During that time the United States Government requested all the people in those districts, without regard to whether they opposed or favored the strike, to give up the arms which they had in their homes. These arms included naturally the guns and pistols that many families have. The Government took these arms and this ammunition in charge. During that time they were shipped from one point to another. During shipment the cars containing them were broken into and robbed. For several years the Government has been trying to pay the owners of these weapons for them. A bill passed the Senate in the last session and came over to the House, but never was acted upon here for some reason. In this session bills were introduced in the House by myself and in the Senate by Senator ROBINSON. The bill has passed the Senate and is now before us for action.

Now, as to the amount in question, the War Department has asked that the sum of $7,800 be allowed. Under the direction of the War Department a board of officers held an inquiry at Fort Logan, Colo., at which people were asked to come in and substantiate their claims. This was not given much publicity and a good many people did not substantiate their claims, but claims were substantiated to the amount of $5,319.64. The War Department asks that the additional amount be allowed, making a total of $7,800, to cover the claims which they estimate will be substantiated by people who have not yet come in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague [Mr. HARDY of Colorado] be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. In order to save the expense of holding a further inquiry the War Department has asked that it be allowed the sum of $7,800.

Mr. DYER. Does the bill provide "or so much thereof as may be necessary"?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DYER. So that in case it is not all needed the remainder will be turned back?

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Of course. Now, I merely want to add that I know about this claim. Every Representative from the State of Colorado knows about it. We know that it is a just claim and that the amount of $7,800 ought to be allowed, as there ought to be a little leeway, in order that just claims which will come in may be paid without further delay.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question being taken, on a division, demanded by Mr. GARD, there were—ayes 14, noes 65.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CANNON. That motion is debatable, is it not, Mr. Chairman?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CANNON. Why not?

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire it by unanimous consent. I think the motion is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. Without having an opportunity to examine the precedents, the Chair is inclined to hold that the motion is not debatable, inasmuch as there has been ample opportunity for debate during the consideration of the bill in the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I just came into the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FARMER'S NATIONAL BANK OF WILKINSON, IND.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 1761) for the relief of the Farmers' National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill is short, and I ask that it be read for the information of the committee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a certificate of indebtedness of the United States of America with interest from February 8, 1918, to May 9, 1918, in favor of the Farmers National Bank, a national banking corporation of Wilkinson, Ind., in lieu of two certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America, Nos. 10307 and 10308, respectively, each bearing date of February 8, 1918, each calling for $1,000, and each maturing May 9, 1918, the said certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America having been stolen: Provided, That the said Farmers National Bank, of Wilkinson, Ind., shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the stolen certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Were these registered bonds?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; they were certificates of indebtedness. I have an amendment which I shall offer in regard to that.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand that they were stolen?

Mr. EDMONDS. They were stolen or lost; nobody seems to know what did become of them.

Mr. GARRETT. I suppose the identification was complete?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It has been approved by the Treasury Department, and the amendment that is to be offered is recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARRETT. The identification is complete?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The bill was read for amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all the words in lines 4 to 11, inclusive, on page 1, and all the words on page 2, in line 1, and the word "stolen," in line 2, and insert the following: "authorized and directed to redeem certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America, Nos. 10307 and 10308, each of the denomination of $1,000, and each of the issue dated February 8, 1918, and maturing May 9, 1918, with interest from February 8, 1918, to May 9, 1918, in favor of the Farmers National Bank, a national banking corporation of Wilkinson, Ind., without presentation of the certificates, the said certificates of indebtedness having been lost or destroyed."

Line 9, page 2, strike out the word "stolen" and insert in lieu thereof the words "lost or destroyed."

Mr. GARRETT. Is this the language asked for by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and the reason for that is that the certificates matured before the bill came up in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. THOMAS M'GOVERN.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 5348) for the relief of Mrs. Thomas McGovern, and I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON. The bill is short, let it be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Thomas McGovern, the sum of $5,000 for damages suffered by reason of her husband, Thomas McGovern, being struck and fatally injured by a Government motor truck which was driven by a regularly enlisted soldier of the United States Army.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is well to advise the membership of the committee, whom I hope are now restored to a point where you can legislate calmly and safely, to the bills as they appear. This is a bill to collect a very large sum of money from the Treasury of the United States, in a proceeding practically without investigation, without evidence, and without report. The only report which we have outside of the fact that this unfortunate man was hit by a Cadillac touring car of the Signal Corps, and injured so that he died a few days later, is the report of Lieut. Col. Hersey, of the Signal Corps, which is this. In paragraph 3 of the report, appearing on page 3 thereof, it recites:

The investigation held by officers of the post shows that a Mr. Dewey, representative of the Excelsior Motorcycle Co., who was in the car, sitting in front with the driver, states that the car was going from 10 to 15 miles per hour, that it was a very misty day, and that when the car turned the corner at Cass and Seventeenth Streets, a man loomed up from the shadow of the street light, and he was immediately in front of the automobile.

The car practically immediately struck the man. It appears to be an unavoidable accident, but after several preliminary examinations charges were preferred against Sergt. (First Class) Ens for violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, which charges are in the hands of the commanding general, Central Department, for his decision whether the case shall be brought to trial or not.

This is the only report we have from any authorized department which should make an investigation concerning that which was done by their agent, the man driving the Cadillac car of the Signal Corps.

As I stated, the report shows that it was an unavoidable accident. There seems to have been no negligence on the part of the driver of the Signal Corps car. There seems to be no reason, so far as I can read, for the establishment of a claim against the United States of America for the death of this man. Of course, we all sympathize very greatly with a man, as everyone must, who loses his life in an accident, but in the orderly process of business, in the consideration of claims, there must be a showing before the money of the public is voted away, before the United States of America is held responsible for his death. Otherwise there could be, properly speaking, no financial liability upon the part of the Federal Government. I call the attention of Members of the House and this committee to the report of Lieut. Col. Hersey, and ask the chairman of the committee and others who may have better information than I, what liability there is upon the part of the General Government for the payment of this sum of $5,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I would state that Thomas McGovern was in his proper place upon the street when he was hit by this car. It was a foggy night. He started across the street. There was a center post in the street and the car was presumed to go around the center post in turning the corner. Thomas McGovern looked in the natural direction to see if any car was coming. There was none coming; but this car, coming in the wrong direction, hit him and killed him. The car was in the hands of the United States military authorities at the time. Thomas McGovern had no insurance and he left a large family, and that fact, I think, appealed to the committee to a considerable extent in making this award. However, there is no question, if you read the testimony, that Thomas McGovern was in his proper place, that he took every ordinary precaution that a man should take in a street of this kind, and it was owing entirely to the fact that the motor car was on the wrong side of the street, driven incorrectly by the operator, that the death occurred. Of course, these awards to an outside party are without any standing in law.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the testimony show whether this car was being used in official business or merely on private business?

Mr. EDMONDS. If my memory serves me right, the car had been in the repair shop and was being taken back from the repair shop to the camp. I think I am correct in that. The matter of the amount of money that we give in a case like this is entirely at the disposal of the House. We can give something or nothing. There will probably be a great many of these cases where people have been either killed or injured by the operation of military trucks. I know that if it had been one of my trucks I would have had to pay damages. Why the United States should not pay damages I am unable to state.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman stated the car was being driven on the wrong side of the street or on the wrong side of a post that was placed there. Was that proven by the evidence?

Mr. EDMONDS. It was proven by the evidence taken before the committee. There are two affidavits there from private parties which shows that the car was on the wrong side of the street. We had blue prints showing the street and the post, and everything was submitted to the committee, but, of course, we could not print them.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the question I desire to ask is this: It seems to me, and I say it with all due deference to the action of the committee, that this committee is reporting out a liability of $5,000 against the Government of the United States, not on any legal ground, because no legal liability is shown, but upon the ground that the committee is sympathetic because of the fact that the man was killed, leaving a considerable family, without insurance. Everyone must be properly sympathetic with that situation, but in the formulation of reports and in the recommendation upon bills I do not think we should be guided by such a line of sympathy. We have very limited time in this Committee of the Whole for investigations. No one here knows anything about the bill, and everyone must depend upon the committee that reports it and those who have heard the evidence in the case. It seems to me there should have been a proper investigation by the War Department and that there should have been a report by the War Department as to what occurred and as to the liability of the General Government on account of it. That is entirely lacking.

because we have only gone so far as to have a report from the lieutenant colonel of the Signal Corps, wherein a man who was on the front seat with the automobile driver testifies that the accident was unavoidable. We have not even any report, so far as I can see, showing the testimony of the driver himself. We do not know how the accident occurred. The report is limited to two affidavits, which are not conclusive, and which the gentleman would hardly offer in a court of law to substantiate a claim for damages. The driver himself is not called upon to testify. The man who was on the seat testified that it was an unavoidable accident. He was there. So far as the House knows from the reading of this report, this should be conclusive. I do not know, but I do think that this Committee on Claims and that every committee and the House should hesitate about idly dissipating the public funds; and because men may imagine that this thing occurred in a certain way and desire to help the man's family, we should not make that the controlling reason for doing so.

We should be guided here upon these matters by merit in the individual case. [Applause.] If this man was injured without fault on his part by an automobile operated by the Signal Corps, then I would say that the man, his family, his administrator, should be entitled to a fair remuneration. On the other hand, if it would be a matter where the man himself was at fault, then he should not be compensated; but if it be one of those intermediate cases where there might be negligence on the one side and negligence on the other, we should know that. If it be an unavoidable accident, as this witness says, then the membership of this House should know that, and if it be unavoidable I am sure gentlemen would not ask this House and the membership thereof to pass the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will yield for the purpose of a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. I ask recognition in my own right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. If it is in order, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the testimony of Ruth Wilson, who said that she was present and saw the accident:

> And that Sergt. Ens, of the United States Army, stationed at Fort Omaha at that time, was on said evening driving an automobile north on said Seventeenth Street, and that said automobile was being driven at a high rate of speed——

Mr. GARD. Oh, that does not mean anything.

Mr. JUUL. She says:

> And west of the center of said Seventeenth Street; that is to say, on the left-hand side of the street, considering the direction in which said automobile was traveling.

If Ruth Wilson testified in any court in the gentleman's State to that effect, and if this automobile was owned by a private individual or by a corporation, the heirs of the decedent would absolutely collect on that testimony, and in my State they would collect $10,000.

Mr. DYER. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. I have no fault to find with it. What I am trying to say is that this House should be advised of all the evidence in the case. All that we have here are two sworn statements, one by Ruth Wilson, and, of course, many things in Ruth Wilson's affidavit are matters of assumption on her part, and it is not sufficiently particular to advise us, as any defendant would be advised on an action to recover damages.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DYER. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the gentleman think that Ruth Wilson would be bright enough to know whether this automobile was running on the right or the wrong side of the street?

Mr. GARD. Of course, I have no acquaintance with Ruth Wilson. I do not desire to criticize her brilliancy, as the gentleman puts it that way, but what I am trying to get before the committee at this time, and which I will insist in getting before the committee, is this: When we are called upon to issue a certificate of payment from the United States Government to any person there should be some reason for the payment of it. There may be reason in this case; I do not know. We have the testimony of these two affidavits; we have the statement of death from the vital statistics of Omaha; we have a statement from the physician as to the injuries; we have the report that the accident was absolutely unavoidable. Now, if the accident was unavoidable, then I suspect the gentleman from Illinois or the gentlemen who have charge of the bill do not desire to pay out the money of the Government of the United States for an unavoidable accident. No private citizen is called upon to pay where the accident is unavoidable. Yet there are cases of that kind; there are many cases occurring upon the streets of Washington, and of every city where traffic is great, where persons are hurt, where persons are killed sometimes, and no financial compensation is allowed. This may be one of those cases. On the contrary, it may be a case where this money damage should be paid to the representatives of the deceased, and what I am trying to get is that we should have a report. There should be some report by the department which had this man Ens. There should be at least a statement in this report by the driver of the automobile as to where he was, what he was doing, and as to his conduct of this machine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. How much time was I recognized for?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. GARD. We have not reached the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; we are under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARRETT. No; we are under the hour rule.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, the time is under the control of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARRETT. He yielded the floor.

Mr. GARD. The Chair recognized me in my own right, and therefore under the rule I am entitled to an hour.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to use an hour; I do not desire to take up the time of the committee; but I am merely calling attention to know for myself, and I suspect the Members of this House are equally interested in knowing, what this bill is.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Would the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Now?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has admitted that Thomas McGovern was killed one night in Omaha in 1917 by an automobile or truck driven by a sergeant of the United States Army. The gentleman from Ohio admits that this man McGovern who, according to the testimony, said when he was approached immediately after the accident, "I am dying," left a number of children and a wife—a widow now. He takes exception to the deposition of Ruth Wilson and another party, who claimed and deposed that the accident was avoidable had proper care been shown; that the sergeant was driving that automobile at a very high rate of speed; that it was a rainy, misty, and windy night, and the automobile did not have any lights burning in front and also was on the wrong side of the street. The report shows the man who was with the driver said it was a Cadillac touring car, a Signal Corps—serial No. 410—going from Omaha to Fort Omaha, driven by Sergt. Edgar Ens, First Balloon School Squadron. He said or deposed that the truck accidentally struck at or near the corner of Seventeenth and Cass Streets, about 6 p. m., November 26, 1917, Mr. Thomas McGovern, a citizen of Omaha, injuring him so badly as to cause his death a few days later.

The report continues:

> The investigation held by officers of the post shows that a Mr. Dewey, representative of the Excelsior Motorcycle Co., who was in the car, sitting in front with the driver, states that the car was going from 10 to 15 miles an hour; that it was a very misty day.

This was 6 o'clock in the evening. Keep that in mind.

> And that when the car turned the corner of Cass and Seventeenth Streets a man loomed up from the shadow of the street lights and he was immediately in front of the automobile.
> The car practically immediately struck the man. It appears to be an unavoidable accident.

This was the man that was with the driver, and yet you are talking about deductions and presumptions. His deposition from beginning to end is a tissue of deductions and inferences for the purpose of shielding the man whom he was with and who ran down negligently a fellow man and killed him.

> But after several preliminary examinations charges were preferred against Sergt. (First Class) Ens for violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, which charges are in the hands of the commanding general Central Department for his decision whether the case shall be brought to trial or not.

The testimony of Wilson and this other party looking affirmatively to establish the case in behalf of this unfortunate woman who was left behind to take care of children, as the result of the reckless driving of this sergeant, establishes the case, in my judgment, in connection with the deposition of this man who was with the driver beyond all contravention.

I do not know that I want to place this Government in the position of some cold-hearted citizen who wants to stick by the letter of the law. I do not know that I want this great sovereign to take the position of a Shylock, and to stand upon its bond and the law. At the last session of Congress this bill was passed, I believe, unanimously, and went over to the Senate, where it died for lack of time to consider it. I feel in view of the depositions of Ruth Wilson and this other person, and the man that accompanied the driver, and the lonely condition of this woman left with a large number of children to support, that $5,000 is too little a recompense to be given her by the Government, considering what we have done for people across the water and to whom we did not owe one-tenth as much as we owe to this woman whose husband gave up his life as the result of the recklessness of one of our own officers.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, as I said before, the great Government of this country is a sovereign, and if we were not in a democracy I would say of royal largeness of purpose, to hold that it should require the same rigid preciseness in evidence as in a private suit against an individual is insisting upon a narrowness that is parsimonious and an adherence to a jurisprudence that I hope will no longer bind the judges of this country. The mere fact that a man is killed in an employment and leaves people behind him is just as much of a cause to compensate those behind as it is for a corporation to put aside money in order to replace its tools that are worn out in the conduct of its business.

When flesh and blood go down to death and leave dependents behind, in my judgment the Government ought to step in and endeavor to ameliorate those melancholy circumstances as much as possible. I recommended $5,000 in this case, because, I want to say, and I do not say it to the credit of the supreme court of the State from which I come, that that court seems to have measured a man's lifetime on this earth and all the great and good things he can do, and the splendid fight he was making for the wife and children behind him, by the beggarly sum of $5,000, dollars piled up on top of one another and given to her to make her way over the rough road of life and bring up her children as decent Americans. When she does accomplish that task, she is entitled to "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, well done."

Mr. Chairman, I feel on this occasion it may not be entirely out of place to say that we have got to look to those that are left in an unfortunate position by reason of the death of the husband or by reason of his inability to make a living. Sufficient be to me that there are children, boys and girls, that are born in this country and that are American boys and girls. And I want to see them arrive at manhood and womanhood, not as derelicts, not as unhappy beings that we look upon with commiseration, but as American boys and girls that can mate with others and go out and fight and die for the country when they are called upon to do it, and do it as Americans, proud of a great and generous country.

Returning to the subject. I say that that evidence, in my judgment, would be conclusive to any jury in this country.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. I only desire to get information. I have no opposition to the bill. I am merely seeking information. The gentleman has probably mistaken my attitude.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have not. I understand thoroughly that you believe that where a case is made out that maybe the amount in this bill would not be large enough. You admit that McGovern was killed, but you are objecting to the consideration of the bill any further at this time on account of what you consider the insufficiency of the evidence.

Mr. GARD. I am not admitting or claiming anything.

Mr. O'CONNOR. You admit that there was a large family left behind for a sad-eyed woman to bring up to help the country in its hour of need as a result of recklessness on the part of a soldier. You admit that the man driving made a statement which, if taken in connection with the other two depositions, would satisfy any jury, for when you examine that statement you see the desire to exculpate the driver—a desire so blunderingly expressed that it adds value to the deposition of Ruth Wilson.

Mr. GARD. I can understand how the gentleman's exuberance might lead him to make the statement he is making, and I am not criticizing him for that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know that that is exactly the proper word—"exuberant"—to convey the feeling that I have in a case of this kind.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman wait a moment while I call his attention to this question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will, except that I object to the word "exuberant" being used in connection with one's feeling concerning the death of a man. I know the gentleman does not mean any offense, and it is not resentment that causes me to note that the word does not express my attitude.

Mr. GARD. I will withdraw that. Can the gentleman tell us whether he has made any investigation in connection with that signal or the truck as to what action occurred there?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. I took the affidavit of Ruth Wilson and the other two affidavits that the gentleman has before him, showing that the machine was driven at a high rate of speed on a rainy night with the lights out.

Mr. GARD. I understand that the gentleman took the deposition of Ruth Wilson and the man who was with the driver?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is sufficient in my judgment.

Mr. GARD. There was no other evidence and no other investigation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No other evidence was necessary. Three witnesses are competent to establish a fact in any court. The expression "I am dying" to Ruth Wilson, whose deposition we have, and which is equivalent to a dying declaration, and that the House passed this bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mrs. McGovern has come to us and asked to be compensated for the death of her husband and the father of her children under the forms of law we have provided. If we do not grant her compensation that will take care of her and her children, her few neighbors will have to take care of them; in other words, a few kind-hearted persons will have to do what a cold-hearted Government will not do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some time.

Mr. GARD. How much time did the gentleman say he wanted?

Mr. JUUL. I would like to have six or eight minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I merely want to add that what is regarded as the dying declaration is also in evidence there.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield time to me?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. JUUL. I realize, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that if it were not for gentlemen like my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a legislative body would often run riot and probably spill the public funds where they ought not to be spilled or wasted. Consequently I want to compliment the gentleman from Ohio for his watchfulness and his care over the dollars belonging to the United States Treasury.

But in the report on this bill there is a sad little story that I am going to read to you. It is signed by Aug. F. Specht, registrar, and Ralph W. Connell, M. D., health commissioner. I read:

BUREAU OF VITAL STATISTICS,

AUG. F. SPECHT, Registrar.
RALPH W. CONNELL, M. D.,
Health Commissioner.

Now, if there is any corroborative evidence in the committee report on this bill to verify the statements made by the registrar and health officer showing negligence on the part of the Government, I would say that the gentleman from Ohio could go into court in his State, with two witnesses, and recover—absolutely recover. I do not know what the financial limit is in his State. In my State we put a $10,000 limit upon death claims.

The trouble with the situation here is this, that we are called upon quite often to sit practically as a United States court in passing upon cases of this kind. I have in mind a number of cases that have occurred in the city in which I live, where United States auto trucks delivering mail have run over people, and have done it recklessly and carelessly; and when we come down here before committees trying to recover for the widows and orphans we find it almost impossible, because it is almost impossible to furnish the legal evidence demanded by the legal gentlemen down here. The first thing, it seems to me, that we ought to satisfy ourselves about is whether or not the gentleman is dead. We agree upon that. What would anybody want to know better than that—that the man was run down by an automobile which was proceeding on the wrong side of the street. No degree of care that the law imposed on this unfortunate man could protect him against that kind of driving. Here is a wife and a family appealing to the Congress of the United States—to do what? To pay them half of what the widow probably could recover if she could go into a local or State court and sue, which she can not do. I sincerely hope that the able leader on that side will forget some of the legal technicalities and see to it that justice is done to this poor woman and her fatherless children. That is all I have to say. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire some time?

Mr. CANNON. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to talk for an hour.

I have no doubt that this man is dead. I presume he left a widow and children. That is so stated. It is said in the talk about this bill that this machine was being driven at a high rate of speed. The eloquent gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] talks about a deposition. There is no deposition in this case. There was no cross-examination. Here is Henry James, who, in his affidavit, says 12 or 15 miles an hour, as I read it. My sight is a little dim. Well, 15 miles an hour. I do not know which was the right side or the wrong side of the street, or if they had any ordinance in this city of Omaha. Which was the side of the street established by ordinance or by State legislation? Does my good colleague know?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I am not asking the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. I am on the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Was there an ordinance?

Mr. LITTLE. The evidence showed that they had at least a custom of coming down and turning the corner at a certain place, and this fellow did it the other way.

Mr. CANNON. Was there any legal ordinance?

Mr. LITTLE. I think it shows that there was.

Mr. CANNON. I do not find any such statement here.

Mr. LITTLE. They always went the other way. The evidence shows that this fellow disregarded the usual custom and killed the man. If he had gone the way everybody else went, he would not have killed him. I think the evidence showed an ordinance.

Mr. CANNON. Well, is there an ordinance or a State law, does the gentleman know?

Mr. LITTLE. The man, instead of coming around, as he should have done, endeavored to cut across.

Mr. CANNON. All I have got to say about it is that I am sorry that this man was killed. I am sorry for his children. I am sorry for the widow. But I wish to suggest to the Committee on Claims, is the Government to be held responsible, especially during war times, for deaths by accidents caused by soldiers? In war you try to kill the enemy, if it is necessary to succeed. The gentleman says there was carelessness. It is not established. Before the Government of the United States begins to pay $5,000 for an accident alleged to have happened under the conditions that this accident is alleged to have happened there should be a formal investigation, a chance to examine and cross-examine witnesses. My feeling would be offhand that no matter who was to blame, if the widow and children were poor, something would be cheerfully given by individuals. I am not a very charitable individual, but after listening to the speech of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR], I think I would have given a sawbuck if I had been requested to give it, but that would have been from my own funds. Now, if we are to commence to pay claims of this or any other kind against the Government for injuries caused by the negligence or mistake or accident of 4,000,000 soldiers in the military service why do not you report an act providing for an inquiry?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. This Congress has passed an act to pay the citizens of France for injuries caused by soldiers in this war. Would you not pay the people of this country as well as pay the people of France?

Mr. CANNON. I am not aware of such an act.

Mr. LITTLE. I am.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman cite me to the statute?

Mr. LITTLE. I can not at the moment give the gentleman the number, but I think I can call the gentleman's attention to it so that he will remember it. When it came up two years ago I called attention to the fact that the bill provided for payment of damages for injury done to the Germans. It was to pay all damages done in France and all foreign countries. I called attention to the fact that Germany was a foreign country, and I did not want to pay any damages done them, and it was corrected in that regard.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect the legislation, but I apprehend that if the gentleman will examine it, he will find that the liability for damages was to be established.

Mr. LITTLE. It was left to the officers of the Army to decide upon the matter and pay out the money.

Mr. CANNON. Why not leave it to the officers of the Army in this case?

Mr. LITTLE. Because the officers of the Army never would pay any damages to any civilian or citizen in this country; I do not know what they do in others.

Mr. CANNON. I indorse the position of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. This evidence had not been cross-examined. There is no report here from the military authorities.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim that where there is an accident in which an official of the Government is involved and is charged with being guilty of carelessness and negligence, that anybody can call for an investigation except the Government itself?

Mr. CANNON. A soldier in the employ of the Government in the event of an accident could be authorized, if there is no statute to investigate, to hear the evidence and make findings.

Mr. HERSEY. But the Government refuses to do that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says that the Government refuses to do it?

Mr. HERSEY. It has not done it.

Mr. CANNON. I will say, just to raise an issue, that the gentleman is mistaken and the burden of proof is upon him.

Mr. HERSEY. If the Government neglects to show that the person suffered from the negligence of the official, is a man to have no remedy?

Mr. CANNON. Damage was done to a citizen not in the military service; if there is any neglect it is the neglect of Congress in not having provided for investigation where there could have been an examination and cross-examination and a finding. [Applause.] If there is to be future cases brought—is the gentleman from Maine on this committee?

Mr. HERSEY. No; I am not.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will say respectfully to the committee, without finding fault with them, that they might well, in my judgment, consider legislation providing for the investigation that I speak of. [Applause.] Now, you come here and ask for $5,000 in this case. Was this a poor man?

Mr. HERSEY. That does not make any difference.

Mr. LITTLE. He had been a member of the city council.

Mr. CANNON. Are his wife and children needy?

Mr. LITTLE. That is the understanding.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman claim that the Government of the United States has the right to be negligent; that it is not to be held for its negligence the same as a private individual?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there is legislation on the statute books touching damages by accident against the Government for Government employees. There is legislation upon the statute books that fixes the pension for the soldiers of the Civil War. There is a statute that fixes the insurance that may be taken out, but it all has to be established after injury and the facts known.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Are not gentlemen proceeding on the assumption that negligence in this case is proven, when as a matter of fact it is not proven?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; there is no proof of it.

Mr. JUUL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Would the gentleman say that negligence is not proven where there is a sworn affidavit here that the soldier was driving a Government car and proceeding on the wrong side of the street?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] very pertinently inquired, a few moments ago, what is the wrong side of the street, where is the ordinance, where is the case? I will undertake to say this, that upon this record there is not a court of appeal in the country that would permit a verdict to stand.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Upon the uncontradicted deposition of a resident of the city?

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman mean to state that a mere affidavit without cross-examination, a general statement that a man was driving at a high rate of speed, would be permitted to govern in a court of law? How high a rate of speed? The other witness testifies 12 to 15 miles an hour, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] is too good a lawyer, as is my friend from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] to state that ex parte statements of that sort could possibly be accepted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Here is an eyewitness who said that this man was going at a high rate of speed. Of course, that may be considered as long as a string. What the gentleman would consider a high rate of speed I might not. As I understand it, the gentleman has in mind that there might be a city ordinance determining legally what is a high rate of speed.

Mr. JUUL. Any rate of speed on the wrong side of the street is a high rate of speed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Here is a woman who says that the man was driving on the wrong side of the street, that the lights were not burning, or that they were burning so low and dimly that one could not see whether they were burning or not, and that this man was killed by this automobile that was being driven at a high rate of speed on the wrong side of the street. Would not the gentleman assume that this lady, who is a resident of the place, knows the traffic rules, because the assumption is, when she declared under oath it was the wrong side of the street, that she knew what she was talking about.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman from Illinois will indulge me for one moment further——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. I think that in any case where a private individual would be liable under the law to answer in damages for an accident the Government of the United States ought to be liable.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not agree with the gentleman upon that.

Mr. GARRETT. Why, certainly the gentleman will not disagree with me upon that. He might go further than I do, but I go to the extent of saying that in any case where an individual would be liable the Government ought to be liable.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not agree with the gentleman on that, but I think the Government ought to be more generous in its treatment of its subjects than the subject ought to be with another subject.

Mr. GARRETT. I do think the case should be made out with as much force as it would be made out in the case of an individual; and if my friend were defending a personal injury suit in court and the witness should state that a person was driving at a high rate of speed, his first inquiry would be, How high a rate of speed? We do not know. That is the opinion of the witness. I do not question her statement. I am not questioning the facts, but I am making the point that the case is not made out here by legal evidence.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Would the gentleman believe that the position would be any stronger if she had said that the machine was being driven at the rate of 30 miles an hour?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman is going into an academic question. I think it ought to be stated with more particularity.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to know how on earth any witness can determine whether a machine is going at the rate of 30 miles an hour or 25 miles an hour without having some mechanism by which to determine it accurately. The woman was looking on, in all probability——

Mr. CANNON. How much time does the gentleman desire? I have the floor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All right; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I am willing to yield to the gentleman, if he desires. As it is, I yield now to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has stated that if a private individual would be responsible in this case the Government ought to be. Now, he says the case should be reversed. I am going to suggest to you that after some years in trying that class of cases I do not think there is a thing in it to relieve any citizen of such responsibility in such a case. What does the evidence show? The evidence shows that this man was on the wrong side of the street, to start with, which is negligence enough to stick anybody. The gentleman asks how we know that it is the wrong side of the street. Why, there is not a court that would not take judicial notice of the fact that a man running on the left-hand side of the street was on the wrong side of the street. In England it is the other way, but there is not a court in this country which would require you to produce evidence that it was the wrong side of the street if you showed that he was on the left-hand side of the street. He was on the wrong side of the street. That is not all. He was running without any headlights, as far as the evidence goes. It shows there were none, or, if there were any, they were so dim as to be of no use. But if they could not see them neither could this man now dead see them. Here was the Government of the United States running an engine down the street without any lights on it, on the wrong side of the street, and this man steps off into the street. He has a right to believe that the street was clear. There never was a greater bit of negligence than when this machine ran into and killed him. If this evidence was introduced and passed on by a jury there is not a court of appeals in the United States that would reverse it. The gentleman says that the rules are not stringent enough. It may be, as the gentleman says, that there ought to be a different law, but this woman used the only law you gave her to secure redress. She came to you and proved her case by the only evidence you asked for, by affidavits sworn to, and every witness can be arrested for perjury if they have lied. If you want a different law, make it. The claimant can not.

If you want to cross-examine, make a law providing for it then. When she came before this committee it was the only evidence she was asked to produce, an affidavit. If perjury was committed, they can be put in the penitentiary. It is evidence enough. Gentlemen, it is as just and clean a claim as ever came before this Congress and before any jury in any court of the United States they would have been given the $5,000.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? In this case the record will disclose that the driver's associate on the seat said it was unavoidable. In any court of justice the credibility of that witness would certainly be open to some kind of question. When the friend of the driver said it was unavoidable, we have the right as a committee to assume he might be trying to cover his friend. His friend presents a mere conclusion——

Mr. LITTLE. It is a mere conclusion. Now, I want to say that this woman has proved the case by the only evidence she was allowed to produce; she has shown that the Government was guilty of gross negligence; that the Government's agent was driving on the wrong side of the street and the man, now dead, stepped out when he knew that there should be nothing dangerous there, and he was hit and killed, and I think this woman should receive here whatever a jury would give. I am going to say here as a lawyer, and stake my reputation on it, that no court in the world would think of reversing the jury's decision upon the evidence after the jury had passed on it, if there is any evidence at all. The evidence shows there were no lights, that the machine was running rapidly on the wrong side of the street, and that is a good case, too good a case to be reversed by any court if a jury gave her a verdict. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. I think I have the floor. I hope the committee will agree to rise and let this bill go over until the next day it is considered.

Mr. LITTLE. It has been waiting for several years.

Mr. CANNON. But you are going to have some more meetings——

Mr. LITTLE. This committee reported this bill favorably two years ago, and how many times do we have to prove the case?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I again ask that the gentleman in charge of this bill—some gentlemen desire that the House adjourn—ask that the committee rise and that the bill go over at this stage.

Mr. LITTLE. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CANNON. Let me put my question. I am asking the gentleman in charge of the bill to ask that the committee do now rise.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will say to the gentleman that personally I am perfectly willing that the committee rise. Some members of the committee may not like it to be done, but personally I am in favor of the committee rising, and probably we can get some more information by the next time. I make that motion.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will make that motion.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman is through with the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I have the floor, and I think I have got half an hour.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CANNON. With the gentleman's assurance that he will move that the committee do now rise, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee has not reported yet.

The SPEAKER. We are in the House. Any gentleman can make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole had not yet reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT. We are not in the House officially until the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has reported.

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold the point until the Chairman makes his report.

The SPEAKER. It is unnecessary for the Chair to decide the point, because the gentleman from Texas withdraws the point of no quorum.

Thereupon Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee, having had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, directed him to report back to the House the following bills without amendment, and with the recommendation that they do pass:

H. R. 400. A bill authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims;

H. R. 396. A bill to authorize the payment of certain amounts for damages sustained by prairie fire on the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota;

H. R. 685. A bill for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 974. A bill for the relief of W. T. Dingler;

H. R. 6413. A bill granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard; and

S. 253. An act for the payment of claims for loss of private property on account of the loss of firearms and ammunition taken by the United States troops during the labor strikes in the State of Colorado in 1914.

Also the following bills with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass:

H. R. 1812. A bill making appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States;

H. R. 1853. A bill to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 5665. A bill for the relief of Carlow Avellina; and

H. R. 1761. A bill for the relief of the Farmers' National Bank of Wilkinson, Ind.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I shall take just as little of the time of the Senate as is necessary to try to explain the features of the bill now pending before the Senate as the unfinished business, being Senate bill 2472, which is generally known as the export finance bill. This bill is the natural and logical result of the greater opportunities of our country because of the war. The bill has been prepared by the Federal Reserve Board, or by their counsel. Briefly, it proposes to relieve the situation in this manner: It provides for the incorporation of banks to engage in foreign business, to be entirely under the supervision and control of the Federal Reserve Board, just as is our national banking system, to be in no way guaranteed or underwritten by the Government, but simply to be supervised by the Government. When an American producer or manufacturer sells a bill of goods abroad under present conditions, as we well know, the credit demanded is practically impossible, so far as the average individual producer or manufacturer is concerned. That situation will be relieved through the incorporation of these banks. There will be no monopoly in them; any number may be incorporated that meet the approval of the Federal Reserve Board and meet the conditions of the bill we are now considering. These banks will then be in a position to take the securities offered to the American manufacturer or producer, so that he can turn the securities into the bank under regular ordinary banking conditions and form. On those securities he receives the amount of the bills that would otherwise be paid him abroad if credit conditions were anything like normal. The bank in turn, of course, will hold the securities of various kinds, and they will be permitted under the act, under supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, to issue bonds or debentures, to the American public or to anyone who, after investigation, may care to purchase them. So that it is simply the natural evolution, the natural development, of the greater opportunities and demands incident to present conditions.

I think we shall all agree, Mr. President, that the one fundamental necessity in this country which touches many of our products is the encouragement of production. Certainly, we must encourage production in every proper and legitimate direction. We have practically completed a wonderful merchant marine. The sole purpose, of course, of that merchant marine is to transport goods to all parts of the world and to bring back goods that we all need as return cargoes. We, then, must endeavor to broaden America's markets. It can not for one moment be argued, I think, that America can consume all its own products. There may be certain types of products—food products of certain kinds—upon which at times an embargo should be laid because of domestic conditions, but as a general proposition certainly we must broaden the market for American producers and American manufacturers if we are going to reach as nearly as possible the 100 per cent maximum of production.

In my judgment, national content and national happiness are practically based upon national prosperity; and national prosperity, of course, means thriving, energetic, successful business. This is not an altruistic scheme at all; it is not a matter of charity; our business men selling goods abroad, of course, are making profits on the sales.

To-day we well know that the rate of exchange is practically prohibitive for further American exportation until something is done to correct the situation. This bill is designed to contribute in that direction, and, I think, in a few words I can explain how it will. In yesterday's papers I noticed—and all Senators have probably read similar articles—that the rate of exchange in France for an American dollar was 8 francs and a fraction; in other words, one dollar and sixty-odd cents for an American dollar. A Frenchman, as a practical illustration, if he bought a consignment of cotton from the South, the American selling price being $1,000,000, would be compelled to pay $1,600,000 under the present rate of exchange for the consignment of cotton. So it goes in the case of all other commodities. In Italy the rate of exchange is even greater.

There are only three ways of which I have heard by which that situation can be stabilized or an effort be made to stabilize it. One is by the importation of gold. That, however, is practically impossible under present conditions abroad, as we must all recognize. Another is the importation of their goods; and the report of the Department of Commerce for the last month demonstrates that the importation of foreign goods is now ascending, while the exportation of our goods is going down, as it naturally will under the present rate of exchange. They bought from us very liberally for a few months after the war because of necessity; they had to buy our goods, and it made little difference what the price was; they had to have our supplies; but as conditions become more normal it is perfectly obvious that they are not going to pay a dollar and sixty cents for a dollar's worth of American products, whatever they may be.

The third method by which to stabilize exchange is by purchasing their securities. The importation of gold, the gathering of imports, and the purchasing of their securities are the three methods indicated. This bill is designed to take over their securities, which the cotton man or the manufacturer of agricultural machinery or the manufacturer of some other commodity will take in exchange for his goods. He himself can not finance the transaction, but he goes to the bank in the natural, orderly way, and the bank finances it. In taking the securities over we are equalizing matters and thus not adding to the great credit balance now in our favor, which, of course, entirely regulates exchange. It is a perfectly simple business proposition.

Our banks at the present time are not in a position to finance foreign sales, and it is necessary, in the wisdom and judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve Board, that we supplement the banking system in this carefully protected manner, so that our business men may have full opportunity to sell their commodities, and so that labor may be continuously employed, and bring about, as nearly as possible, a 100 per cent production. That is the entire object of the bill.

I have had several amendments suggested in order that the bill may not in any way be misinterpreted. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who is now out of the Chamber, has prepared some amendments, and I see no reason why most of them can not be accepted, although one or two I will probably discuss briefly. I think we have met every condition to insure safety, because the only possible object of this measure is to meet the situation which I have endeavored briefly to explain.

We have loaned in round figures to the allied nations some $9,000,000,000, as I recall. I think it is generally recognized that in order to rehabilitate Europe in a way, as we must, not only from a humanitarian standpoint but from the standpoint of the ordinary exchange of business, perhaps two or three billion dollars more will be required. Mr. President, is it not a perfectly clear business proposition that it is very much better for us to send abroad goods on which our business men make profits rather than to send cash, on which we must charge some form of taxation?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. If we can afford to rehabilitate Europe commercially and for trade purposes, why is it not equally important for us to rehabilitate it or to help rehabilitate it politically and socially?

Mr. EDGE. Well, Mr. President, I have found that a man is not very successful trying to be a jack of all trades. I have tried to make a modest study of this situation, and I feel reasonably sure of my ground in pressing this measure. I assume that there are reasons, perhaps, along the line indicated by the Senator from Minnesota, but I am not prepared to discuss them in connection with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator will concede that anything that will help Europe industrially will probably tend to help them socially.

Mr. EDGE. I think so. It is only necessary for me to point back to the remark I made a few moments ago, that the foundation of social happiness and social reform is national prosperity.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are some questions I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey, if it will not too seriously interrupt the argument he is making.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be very glad to answer them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not quite grasp all that this bill seems to authorize. The first question that I want to ask, purely for information, is this: Are these institutions which are to be organized under the act to do anything more than every bank in the United States is now authorized to do?

Mr. EDGE. Not as much as the national banks are now authorized to do under the Federal Reserve System. I might say in that connection that when the bill is up for committee amendments I am going to offer an amendment striking out of the bill the privilege of transacting fiduciary business, which I do not think is necessary in a bank of this kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not that thought in my mind; but we have in this country a great number of banks of various kinds, both State and Federal, and I understand the Senator from New Jersey to say that all these banks can and do transact every kind of business which is proposed to be transacted by the institutions authorized under this bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, they do not. That, I think, is perfectly obvious. In the first place, the capital of the average American bank, with some exceptions, is confined entirely to domestic development, and they have about all they can do in that connection. This great, big problem of financing to-day, with Europe impoverished, makes it necessary to organize absolutely new banks for the specific purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can realize that some banks, by reason of their limitations in capital, might not be able to do all that some of the banks to be authorized under this act could do; but, so far as authority is concerned, they may do the very kind of business that is here proposed.

Mr. EDGE. So far as I understand, I think that is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. And their capital, of course, can be enlarged to the extent to which investors are willing to embark their money in such enterprises. That is true, is it not?

Mr. EDGE. If I may interrupt the Senator there, I think the essential difference is this: The practice of the average American bank or trust company, under the law and the custom as well, is to receive deposits and to loan money on promissory notes or other security from a domestic standpoint. These banks are authorized—I am not sure whether national banks are or not—these banks are authorized, and their main and practically only method of securing income is, to issue upon the securities, the liquid assets brought over here from Europe, bonds or debentures to be offered to the public. That is a different type of business from the business conducted by American national banks.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there anything in this bill that authorizes the bank that is to be organized under it to issue its own bonds?

Mr. EDGE. To issue its own bonds or debentures on the securities? It has—I think that is the intent of the bill, as I recall it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I read the bill only hastily, but I do not see anything in the bill that authorizes any such transaction.

Mr. OWEN. It provides that they may borrow or loan money on real or personal securities.

Mr. CUMMINS. All banks have that power.

Mr. EDGE. But the average American bank is not issuing bonds or debentures, is it?

Mr. CUMMINS. But does the Senator from New Jersey think that this bill would authorize these institutions to issue what are commonly known as bonds?

Mr. EDGE. Or debentures—I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator point out the part of the bill which confers that authority?

Mr. EDGE. Subdivision (a), on pages 4 and 5, I think covers that situation:

(a) To purchase, sell, discount, and negotiate notes, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, cable transfers, and other evidences of indebtedness; to purchase and sell securities, including the obligations of the United States or of any State thereof; to accept bills or drafts drawn upon it subject to such limitations and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may impose; to issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell, exchange, coin and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal security; to receive deposits.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not an accomplished banker by any means; but, as I understand the situation, there probably is not a bank in the United States that has not authority to do all that is prescribed or suggesed in this paragraph.

Mr. EDGE. That may be; but, Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, of course these institutions in their foreign operations will have to conform to the local laws where they operate. As I understand, where it would be lawful for the banks in foreign countries to issue these debentures, it will then be lawful for the American institutions to do likewise.

Mr. EDGE. That is my understanding.

Mr. McLEAN. That is made clear, it seems to me, by the language at the close of subdivision (a):

Such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act or as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am trying to find out—and it is only for the purpose of being able to comprehend the bill—whether the corporations which are to be organized under this act have or are expected to have some distinct powers which the present banking institutions of this country do not possess.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. I understand that they would have all the powers that are incidental or authorized in the case of foreign institutions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Every corporation has the incidental powers that are necessary to enable it to carry out or perform its distinct or express powers, I assume.

Mr. OWEN. There is a very important limitation resting on the national banks which I do not think would be imposed upon corporations of this character, organized for this purpose. Section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that no national banking institution—

Shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

First. Notes of circulation.

Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association or due thereto.

Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserved profits.

Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

If these corporations should undertake to issue debentures—which, of course, would be borrowing money under the form of an I. O. U. or a certificate of indebtedness or a promise to pay in a fixed period—against securities which they regard as adequate, they would have an open door to underwriting on a much larger scale than their capital, and that would be subject to the Reserve Board. Now, in the actual transaction of foreign business there are only comparatively a few banks that are dealers in foreign exchange, and those banks have gone as far as they can with their resources and the limitations which rest upon them; so that there is now no adequate support for foreign exchange.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then we come to the conclusion that these institutions are not to have put upon them the limitations with respect to loaning money which now rest upon the national banks?

Mr. OWEN. I think not.

Mr. EDGE. But I might add to the Senator from Iowa that of course every transaction is under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that; that is, I see that written all through the bill; but it might be unwise to vest an unlimited or unbridled discretion even in the Federal Reserve Board, and I am trying to discover what these institutions can do that other banks can not do. The Senator from Oklahoma says there is no limitation upon their loaning power; that is, no such limitation as is imposed on the national banks.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think the Senator quite understood what I intended to convey. These institutions, if they are established, all have to be established with a very large primary capital, and that primary capital operates as a bond given to the public to safeguard any loans they may make. They, of course, would have their primary capital in jeopardy if they do not make the loans wisely; and with a capital of twenty-five millions, for example—which I think would be a minimum amount for a bank of this character—they would put that capital in jeopardy if they made loans that were unwise. This bill, however, safeguards the matter further by the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, which has been found efficient in the past.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand, of course, that the capital stock, or the capital invested by shareholders in every corporation, is a guaranty of the fulfillment of the obligations of that corporation; but is there any limitation here upon the power of these banks to loan money?

Mr. EDGE. I should say only that set by the Federal Reserve Board, and the natural expectation that business of a volume of this character would be conducted upon a sane and safe financial basis. If not, the Federal Reserve Board, with its frequent reviews and investigations, would certainly soon put an end to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no provision in this bill giving or reserving to the States the right to tax the property of the institution, as I read the bill. Does the Senator from New Jersey contemplate the immunity from taxation which arises from the relation of the corporation to the Government, namely, as a fiscal agent of the Government?

Mr. EDGE. Not at all. That question I had discussed in conference with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and an amendment will be offered to make it clear. However, there is no intention on the part of the original compiler of the bill to have it escape taxation, because his explanation—I am not a lawyer, but I accept that explanation as being definite—his explanation was, in effect, that all banking corporations were taxed under the laws of the United States unless specifically exempted by statute. Now, the Federal reserve banks are specifically exempt from taxation, and, so far as I know, they are the only banking corporations exempt from taxation. So the mere fact that these were not recited as being exempt would mean that they would be subject to taxation; but when the question was raised in conference with the Senator from North Dakota I at once accepted without hesitation an amendment which he is going to offer later which makes that clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand the law precisely as stated by the Senator from New Jersey. As I recall, the case that first established the principle—that of McCulloch versus Maryland, long, long ago—had no specific exemption from taxation in it, and it was held that the State could not tax a Federal corporation operating at a fiscal agent of the Government at all; but if the Senator from New Jersey has that in mind, I need not dwell upon it. The thing that challenged my attention more than any other one feature of it, however, was this: The Senator in the bill proposes to repeal, so far as these institutions are concerned, sections 7 and 8 of what is commonly known as the Clayton Act. Those provisions rest upon all the other banking institutions of the country. They seem to have interfered but little, if at all, with the legitimate operations of banking.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey specifically to section 7 of the act referred to in this bill. First, the bill says:

The provisions of section 7 of the act approved October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," shall not apply to corporations or to officers, directors, or employees of corporations organized under this section.

Turning to section 7 of the act to which reference is made, I quote the first two paragraphs of the section:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

I rather assumed that one of the chief purposes of the bill was to relieve these corporations of the operation of that law, whereas other banking corporations are subject to the law.

Mr. EDGE. I had anticipated that question being raised, and I am very glad it has been raised by the Senator from Iowa.

I would have touched on it myself before concluding my remarks if he had not raised it.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I desire at this time is to call it to the attention of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. My attention had been already called to the section, and I gave it very careful consideration. In fact there are two sections, that section and section 8 as well.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator's view of that matter.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely rose for the purpose of saying that I think that particular language on page 6 could be eliminated so as to free the bill from objection on the score pointed out by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not possibly understand why it is sought to relieve any corporation engaged in interstate or foreign commerce from the operation of that law unless we are going to relieve all.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the colloquy between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Oklahoma, but I think I can make my view very clear in a few moments.

In the first place, I can not conceive of any logical reason, from a business, economic, or any other standpoint, why we should care what combinations may be made among American manufacturers or bankers in Europe to sell American goods or to finance them. A previous Congress went on record some years back, four or five years ago, I believe, and passed an act known as the Webb-Pomerene Act, in which it was clearly set forth, going even much further than this bill, that corporations in this country could combine for the purpose of successfully carrying on an export business. That is now a law. Any concern in this country selling goods abroad must of necessity abide by the laws of that country. To-day we are met in our endeavor to increase and expand our export trade by various embargoes on the other side and by national monopolies. It does seem to me that there can be no logical reason against this measure. We are not dealing in America. They are not combining here to fix prices to the consumers in California or New York. They are going abroad, as they are already empowered to do under the Webb-Pomerene Act, and we are simply financing in a way, you might say, the Webb-Pomerene Act by establishing under the supervision of the Government these banks to help do the business which Congress has already provided and invited our business men to undertake.

So far as section 8 of the Clayton Act is concerned, to which the Senator refers, that has already been amended by a subsequent Congress after the passage of the Clayton Act, empowering, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, a director—and that refers to an interlocking directorate—to be a director of two other banks with the consent, as I recall the language or the meaning of the language, of the Federal Reserve Board. So they are already, without this section, I presume, under that act permitted to become directors in one of these banks and at the same time to be directors in some other banking institution. That is already the law of the country. It is repeated in this act, I do not know specifically why, except that counsel in drawing the bill wanted to draw particular attention to it, just as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] proposes shortly to introduce an amendment relating to taxation, to draw specific attention to it, and I agree with him that it is wise to do it.

I can not conceive that there can be any reasonable objection to Congress encouraging our business men to get orders and to get paid for them abroad. The cotton men of the South, the industries of the Middle West and the West and the New England States to-day have orders on their books that they simply can not fill because of the situation regarding foreign credit. What in the world can happen that can hurt this country if two banks get together, this section of the Clayton Act being set aside, in order to help finance this trade? Competition in banking is certainly not destructive in the ordinary sense. As to competition in commodities, yes; I can well see and appreciate the reason and the proper reason for protecting the public, so that there may be competition. Banks to-day consolidate all over our country. Whenever business requires it or inspires it new banks are organized under the laws of the United States. Banks do not compete in a destructive way. Of course, they compete for business as all business institutions do, but certainly the waiving of the Clayton Act in these particulars in order to finance the trade of this country and increase production and employ the labor of the country is one of those reconstructive steps that the whole American public are looking to this Congress to bring about. I personally and positively indorse the bill, so far as that provision is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that be true, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey where then is the conflict between the institutions that he proposes to organize and the two paragraphs of the Clayton Act which I have read?

Mr. EDGE. Personally, Mr. President, I do not see any, but lawyers have their own method of drawing acts, and I feel that it is well to recite a condition so that it may be plainly understood by those who will consult the act, and certainly no harm can come from it.

I understand the bill is now in Committee of the Whole, and I do not wish to take any more time if possible. I should like to have the Senate pass on the committee amendments, so that we can receive other amendments that may be offered from the floor and get the bill in such a shape that further discussion, if desired, can take place.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has referred to the amendment of the Federal reserve act, but that, I will say to the Senator, applies only to interlocking directorates. It does not apply to section 7 of the Clayton law. There is quite a difference in the provisions of section 7 and section 8. I am not a lawyer, but I will say that the amendment to the Federal reserve act does not permit restraint of trade, which, of course, this bill would permit if it passes in the form in which it has been reported from the committee. There is that difference, and I think it is a wide difference.

The Senator also knows that this bill is not strictly a banking bill. Under the banking laws of the United States no banking corporation can deal in stocks. They are permitted to deal in bonds, but not in stocks. Under this bill those institutions could buy every railroad in Europe if they had the money with which to do it. They could buy all the stock in all the corporations, regardless of the kind of corporation it might be.

Mr. EDGE. May I interrupt the Senator at that point? Is it not better, may I ask, to buy or to take over European securities in exchange for American goods, whatever they may be, than to tax the American people to send money abroad, which costs us, of course, a taxable expense?

Mr. GRONNA. It may be better, but I think we ought not to extend the provisions of the Clayton Act giving immunity to corporations dealing in financial affairs.

Mr. EDGE. This is not a charity, of course. It is a different proposition in America.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is very important that we should understand the provisions of the bill. If I am misinformed or do not understand the provisions of the bill, I hope some Senator who is familiar with the banking laws will correct me. I believe I am absolutely right in my statement when I say that the amendment to the Clayton Act simply permits interlocking directorates. It does not have any reference whatever to restraints of trade, except if such other bank, banking association, or trust company is not in substantial competition with such member bank.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not understand that the bill amends the Clayton Act, but it excepts these corporations from the operation of the act.

Mr. GRONNA. But it has been proposed, and the amendment will be offered, to strike out the provision of this bill which exempts these banking corporations from the provisions of section 7 of the act approved October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be. I was going to ask the question later on as to why it is necessary to exempt these corporations from the operation of the act.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think it is necessary. I think it would be very unwise to do so. That was the statement which I made to the committee, but I was in a hopeless minority. Of course, the bill was favorably reported. I argued that proposition before the committee and called attention to the fact that in my humble judgment I felt it was unwise. When the Senator from New Jersey says that these are foreign corporations, the Senator knows that these corporations will be organized in this country; they will be operated in this country; they will come in competition with the banking corporations of this country to a certain extent. I do not think any Member of the Senate or any member of the committee will deny that.

Mr. EDGE. My answer to that is that the American Bankers' Association seems to be entirely satisfied with the bill from correspondence that I have from bankers. They are most interested in it.

May I just read briefly on that point? I do not desire to take any further time than is necessary, but I wish to read from a letter just received from Gov. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, touching on this feature. Perhaps it will answer somewhat the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I asked Gov. Harding to give me his judgment on the question raised, and he replied as follows:

It has been suggested that a corporation of this character may be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. This suggestion comes as a complete surprise to me in view of the fact that corporations practically identical with those provided for under Senate bill 2472 have been organized and operating under State laws for some time and many national banks have already invested in the stock of such corporations under the present provisions of section 25 of the Federal reserve act. There has never been any suggestion that these corporations tend to monopolize the granting of credits issued for the purpose of financing international commerce. The fact that there are already in existence so many similar corporations organized and operating under State laws should in itself be sufficient to rebut the assumption that a similar corporation organized under Federal law would be for the purpose of monopolizing or would in fact monopolize the granting of credits in contravention of the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Furthermore as you are, of course, aware, Senate bill 2472 does not provide for nor contemplate the incorporation of only one institution to engage in this character of business. It is not only possible but probable that many institutions of this character will be formed in various parts of the country for the purposes outlined in the act and investments in the stock of those corporations will lawfully be open to and available for the public as a whole as well as for national banks.

I might say that we just passed a bill introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] which has just passed the House, providing that 5 per cent of the combined surplus and capital of banks may be invested in these institutions.

But in any event, regardless of the number of corporations organized and regardless of the identity of their stockholders, all their duties and powers are performed and exercised subject to the supervision and regulation of the Federal Reserve Board.

As previously stated, I gladly and unqualifiedly indorse the bill as reported.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, anyone who has studied this bill and who has studied the banking laws knows that what Gov. Harding states is true, that laws have been enacted permitting this, but let me call the Senator's attention to what developed in the hearings last winter before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and I want the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to hear this and to substantiate that what I say is correct.

It was admitted by Ogden Armour that Armour & Co. made $10,000,000 of profit in South America and that they took $5,000,000 out of their own capital, the capital of Armour & Co. of Chicago. When the Senator from Nebraska—I think it was—asked him if any taxes were paid on that to the United States, their attorney very very quickly came to Mr. Armour's rescue and called attention to the act, and that under this particular act it was not necessary to do so because they were exempt from it.

Does any Senator here want to extend that law and say that American capital shall be taken from America and employed in other countries and vast profits shall be made and no taxes paid into the Treasury of the United States? If that is the wish of the Senate, then I have nothing more to say against the proposition, but so far as I am personally concerned I shall never vote to extend that law, and I was opposed to that provision when it first passed.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into the debate further. I am quite sure it is unnecessary to say, and I think I have generally referred to the fact, that this is not a charitable proposition; that when an American business man sends goods abroad he expects to make a profit on them and when the American bank finances them it expects to make a profit on it. I do not see where we are sending any money abroad except to make a profit for Americans. That is an ordinary business exchange proposition.

I ask that the bill may be read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to point out some things that ought to be considered before any amendments are adopted.

I wish to say, in the first instance, that I am in entire sympathy with the general purposes of the bill. I have no objection and could have no objection to the organization of banks intended to facilitate the commerce of America with other nations of the world. No man could have any objection to a proposal of that kind. But when we come to organize the institutions and grant them the powers which they are to exercise, we ought to take care that we do not grant them powers that no organization should be permitted to exercise, and we ought to be careful to define precisely what those institutions can do and what they can not do.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator understands that these banks are doing business in foreign countries and only in foreign countries, and how can they successfully transact business in foreign countries unless they have the same privileges that are accorded like institutions in foreign countries? That is all there is to the bill. It simply gives these banks the same privileges that are accorded to like institutions doing business in foreign countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. I never heard that proposal made in just that way before—that it is wise for the United States to grant to a corporation organized under our laws all the powers, all the privileges, all the immunities that may exist with respect to corporations in every country in the world. I do not think that is a sound proposition, nor do I think it is necessary to carry the enterprise to any such extent in order to make it entirely successful.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is too broad. The bill, as I read it, is an authorization for the purpose of engaging principally in international or foreign banking or other financial operations.

Mr. McLEAN. It reads:

And generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act or as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not bar the corporations that are organized in this country from doing 49 per cent of their business in the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. If the language does not limit the business of those corporations to foreign operations, it should do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator it does not do it. Under the provisions of this bill a bank organized under it can do 49 per cent of its business in the United States and 51 per cent in foreign countries.

Mr. McLEAN. I must disagree with the position taken by the Senator from Utah in that particular.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I can not read the English language aright, nor do I understand it.

Mr. McLEAN. It concerns only such transactions in this country as will enable it to do business in foreign countries, and those incidental transactions are entirely under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care to take the time of the Senator further now, but I shall discuss that matter later.

Mr. McLEAN. If there is any doubt about the interpretation of the language, I think it should be changed.

Mr. EDGE. I have already discussed with the Senator from Utah the word "principally." However it may be misconstrued, I am sure the author of the bill meant, as the Senator from Connecticut has very clearly set forth, that the word "principally" means principally in the business of foreign trade, but there must be at times some local financing in order to finance foreign securities. The language might be changed to make the meaning clear.

Mr. McLEAN. That is entirely independent of the position taken on the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa; that is, that these institutions must, in order to compete if they do a strictly foreign business, have the same privileges that foreign institutions have. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut stated the question in that way; I did not. I simply answered the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut. I have not stated my own position with regard to it yet, but I shall endeavor to do so now.

I repeat that I have no disposition whatever to prevent the organization of banks in this country which have for their purpose the rendering of necessary assistance in extending our foreign trade. Every bank has that privilege now, and especially do the national banks under the Federal reserve act and the Federal reserve banks have that power. If we can add to it in any proper way, I shall not object.

Mr. EDGE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that is all we are seeking. We do not want to make them so difficult of incorporation that it will not be practicable.

Mr. CUMMINS. A bill has been brought in here to effectuate that purpose which has no limitations whatever upon it. We are organizing, as I view the bill, a series of incorporations which may do anything, everything, anywhere without any restriction of the law, save as the law may reside in the orders or the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board. I do not believe it is wise to set afloat corporations with these roving and indefinite and indeterminate powers, and I am going to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey the respects in which I think his bill might well be modified and amended. The first one is in the very beginning of section 25, pointed out by the Senator from Utah:

SEC. 25 (a). Corporations to be organized for the purpose of engaging principally in international or foreign banking or other financial operations, or in banking or other financial operations in a dependency or insular possession of the United States, either directly or through the agency, ownership, or control of local institutions in foreign countries—

And so forth.

First. It is only necessary that the principal business of the corporation to be organized shall be international or foreign banking. It can not be contended that this limitation excludes the corporation from a very large participation in other affairs. They need not be incidental or connected in any way with the banking business. All that is necessary is that the principal part of the business of the corporation shall be international or foreign banking or other financial operations.

Mr. EDGE. May I interrupt the Senator there to read a regulation which is already in force, to demonstrate how the Federal Reserve Board handles similar situations in the case of State organizations which are organized for similar purposes? It is very short. To demonstrate that we must give some consideration to the supervisory boards, and that they will not permit these institutions to do some of the things that might be inferred from the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, here is a direct provision in connection with the receiving of deposits which is important in connection with the question of competition with other banks——

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the idea of the Senator from New Jersey of the word "principally"?

Mr. EDGE. I am simply bringing this up to demonstrate that we may certainly grant some latitude to the supervisory board of the Government which is now supervising our banking institutions, and in connection with the point made by the Senator as to there being no limitations I wanted to show the Senator how they are limited at the present time. This is the form of agreement between the Federal Reserve Board and corporations doing a foreign banking business to-day:

Form of agreement required by the Federal Reserve Board of foreign banking corporations as a condition precedent to the purchase of their stock by national banks under the provisions of section 25 of the Federal reserve act.

A. General. In order to enable you and other corporations of the same character to compete effectively in foreign countries it is necessary that latitude be given in the development of business abroad, and the board believes that, for the present at least, restrictions should not be rigid or too much in detail, and that it is desirable to prescribe only general rules for your guidance. As occasion requires, the board will modify its regulations in such manner as experience may prove to be necessary.

B. Powers. 1. In the United States:

(a) Deposits: It is clear that in order to avoid competition in the matter of receiving deposits with national banks and State banks, which do not enjoy the wide powers which you must necessarily possess in order to compete successfully in foreign countries, you should not be permitted in the United States to receive individual deposit accounts or domestic bank exchange or collection accounts. You will be permitted, however, to receive any deposit which is incidental to, or for the purpose of, carrying out transactions in foreign countries or dependencies of the United States where you have established agencies, branches, or business connections. Deposits of this character may be made by individuals, firms, corporations, or banks, whether foreign or domestic, and may be time deposits or on demand.

I am merely inserting that in the RECORD at this time to show that the Federal Reserve Board is now controlling various State institutions which are engaged in the same business, and it is reasonable to presume that they would establish similar regulations for banks directly under their control.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, that does not relate to the point I am making at all. It is impossible to predicate anything upon the extract which has just been read by the Senator from New Jersey, so far as the use of the word "principally" is concerned. "Principally" does not mean incidental; "principally" does not mean that this bank must engage alone in the business of banking.

Mr. EDGE. I have already said, Mr. President, that I am entirely ready to change that paragraph. I was discussing particularly the matter of limitation to which the Senator from Iowa referred.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am unable, of course, to tell in just what respects the Senator from New Jersey is willing to amend his bill and in what respects he is not willing to amend it. Therefore I may refer to some things that the Senator from New Jersey is perfectly willing to eliminate from the bill; but I can say that the word "principally" ought to be stricken from the bill, because it would give these banking institutions the authority to enter into any business whatever, and the Federal Reserve Board can not prevent the exercise of the power which is expressly given in the statute.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator from Iowa mean a bank could enter into any business in this country?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not agree with him. I should think it could not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know the Senator from Connecticut does not agree with me.

Mr. EDGE. I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa, but I think we can so change the language that there can be no question about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 6, line 18, it seems to me, the power is limited in words to international business. The provision there reads:

No corporation organized under this section shall carry on any part of its business in the United States except such as, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, shall be incidental to its international or foreign business.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is foreign business? Foreign business may be conducting a factory or any other producing plant, and I assume that that is not the intention of the Senator from New Jersey. I am simply pointing out what must be the inevitable construction of this language if the necessity should ever arise.

Mr. EDGE. May I say in furtherance of the point made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] that I think it is perfectly clear that they could not engage in domestic business at all unless permitted to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, and then such business must be absolutely connected with a foreign transaction. That is provided in section (d) on page 6.

Mr. CUMMINS. That language reads:

No corporation organized under this section shall carry on any part of its business in the United States except such as, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, shall be incidental to its international or foreign business—

But that business may be other than banking business.

Mr. EDGE. We have an amendment to offer covering that.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest as an example, for instance, that a banking house underwrites the shipment of a cargo to Constantinople, but when it arrives there the foreign buyers do not meet their obligations and the cargo may not be sold. It may be necessary to return it and dispose of it here. So when they are underwriting commerce they may be actually confronted at any time with a cargo which is not disposed of and which they may be compelled to dispose of.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is purely incidental to the business of any institution that has the power to loan money.

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly it is incidental.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is not the point I am now bringing to the attention of the Senate. The point I am bringing to the attention of the Senate is that the authority here is to do any kind of business, provided the principal part of its general operations is international or foreign banking.

Mr. OWEN. I think the intention of the bill is really to establish banking business dealing in foreign matters, and that the incidental matters which might relate to commerce are incidental in fact, and that any language that would accomplish that would be acceptable.

Mr. CUMMINS. My own view of it is that it is not confined to such things as may be incidental to the banking business. No one could complain of granting a bank the power to do such business as is incidental to the purpose for which it is organized. It would have that power if it were not granted at all.

The second suggestion that I present is that the words "financial operations" are somewhat indefinite. What are financial operations? What is the scope of that term? I do not remember that it has been used in any other act creating banks. If it is intended to confine these institutions to banking or the banking business, with such incidental power as may be necessary to effectuate the banking business, I have no objection; but I do not believe that their powers ought to be extended to all financial operations.

Mr. EDGE. I will say, Mr. President, that those words are used for the reason already mentioned in the discussion that these banks will assume a rather new side of banking. I think the word "banking" would probably cover it, but in the interest of comprehensiveness the words referred to have been used. In view of the fact that these institutions will have the power to issue bonds and debentures, such transactions might well be called financial operations. They might well be called banking operations, but I can not see that the language in any way interferes with the intent of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. To me it is a very serious matter. You are trying to set afloat on the business world of America corporations of large capital. We have been somewhat careful in times past to limit the rights and privileges of such corporations, so that we could fairly understand what they could legally do and what they could not legally do.

Mr. EDGE. As to that, the Senator is entirely correct; but I am afraid he has not read the remainder of the bill. If he will consult page 4, I think he will find that the bill specifically defines the various powers covered under the words "financial operations." Those words are defined to mean "to purchase, sell, discount, negotiate notes," and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will come to that in a moment and see whether or not that is true. I do not so read the bill. I think the bill ought to be limited to the banking business and the incidental powers which flow from the banking business, but ought not to be extended to the general operations of commerce.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I move to strike out the word "principally," in line 9, page 1.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to hear the Senator move to strike that word out——

Mr. OWEN. I thought that would meet the Senator's primary objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is the initial objection, but I would hardly call it the primary objection.

Mr. OWEN. Well, the initial objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have other objections that I desire to point out, and I think the Senator from Oklahoma will see the force of them precisely as he has seen the force of this. I pass on to another provision.

The corporation is given the power, as suggested by the Senator from New Jersey—

(a) To purchase, sell, discount, and negotiate notes, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, cable transfers, and other evidences of indebtedness—

I have no objection whatever to a power of that sort, because it is critically the business of a bank—to purchase and sell securities, including the obligations of the United States or of any State thereof; to accept bills or drafts drawn upon it subject to such limitations and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may impose; to issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell, exchange, coin and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal security; to receive deposits—

I have some question about the wisdom of giving to the institution the general and unlimited right to purchase and sell securities, but I do not remark upon that rather wide power, but come directly to this—and generally—

And this is the point raised by the Senator from Connecticut—and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act—

To that I have no objection; I think the corporation would have those powers if not specified—or as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

I think it would be exceedingly unwise to organize a corporation, giving it these unnamed, indefinite, unknown powers, for which of course we as a government are in a measure if not entirely responsible. I am willing to give the corporation the powers necessary to enable it to transact the business which we authorize it to do, and nothing more. I do not know what the powers of a bank in Holland or in Belgium or in France or in Australia or in Italy or in Russia may be, and I would be very sorry to confer upon any corporation organized under the laws of the United States all of the powers that all these countries confer upon their financial institutions. I think that provision of the bill ought to be very radically modified.

Under paragraph (d) on page 6 it is provided:

Corporations organized under authority of this section may be granted permission by the Federal Reserve Board to exercise any or all of the powers specified in section 11 (k) of the Federal reserve act in so far as the exercise of said power may be necessary in the conduct of the foreign or international business engaged in by such corporations.

I have no objection to that.

No corporation organized under this section shall carry on any part of its business in the United States except such as, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, shall be incidental to its international or foreign business.

If its business had been limited originally to the banking business, as it ought to be, there could be no just exception taken to the paragraph I have just read, but its business is not confined to the banking business, and therefore it seems to me that much more care ought to be exercised in the paragraph I have just read.

And provided further, That except such as is incidental and preliminary to its organization no such corporation shall exercise any of the powers conferred by this section until it has been duly authorized by the Federal Reserve Board.

That is a wise provision.

Now, we come to the repeal, or to the exclusion of these banks from the operation of section 7 of the Clayton Act. The Senator from New Jersey suggests that we ought to have no objection to repealing that act so far as these corporations are concerned, because they will have nothing to do with competition in business. I think he is in error with regard to that. In the first place, until the corporations are confined by the terms of the act to the banking business, they may engage in foreign trade in this country. They may engage in domestic trade in this country, in my judgment, under the terms of the act, and the Senator from New Jersey does not propose, as I understand him, to modify the Clayton Act except so far as banking is concerned.

Now, let us see how it will operate in banking. I assume the Senator from New Jersey contemplates that there will be many of these banks organized. If the need is as great as he believes it to be—and I have no disposition to question that—there must be many of these corporations organized to facilitate and to finance our foreign trade. Why does the Senator from New Jersey desire to stifle competition as between these institutions in America? That is the effect of repealing the Clayton Act or excluding these institutions from the Clayton Act.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Will the Senator from Iowa suggest what harm could come to the American public from removing the limitation of the Clayton Act so far as concerns the handling of a foreign account, selling goods for a foreign account, and financing the operation through the issuing of bonds or debentures by this bank, or that bank, or the other bank—where in any way the Clayton Act would have any effect if invoked?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can see very great harm; and the Senator from New Jersey was entirely in error when he suggested, a few moments ago, that this does not go as far as the Webb-Pomerene bill. It goes very much further, and has much less supervision connected with it. I may say in passing that I thought the Webb-Pomerene bill was not guarded as it should have been, and I voted against it because it was not sufficiently guarded in the interests of American business and American producers; but I can easily point out to the Senator from New Jersey why he ought not to insist upon the repeal of the Clayton Act in this respect.

Here is a great business world engaged in competition in the foreign business as well as in the domestic business. It is not to be assumed that because we passed a bill which permitted certain combinations and practices in foreign business, therefore competition in America has ceased with regard to foreign affairs. On the contrary, I take it that it is quite as active now as it ever has been before, and I sincerely hope that it will remain as active in the future as it has been in the past. It is just as easy to do injustice to an American producer who intends to sell his product abroad as it is to do injustice to him if he intends to sell it at home. After all, you must consider the conditions under which production takes place; and the chief object or one of the great objects of the antitrust law, as well as of these sections of the Clayton Act, was to prevent injustice and oppression practiced by a combination against a producer, no matter whether he intended to sell his goods abroad or whether he intended to sell them at home.

A great many people think that the antitrust law ought to be repealed. A great many people believe that the Clayton addition to it should be repealed. I am expressing no criticism upon those who hold those opinions; but, in my judgment, it ought to be preserved in all its vigor until a case is presented which clearly shows that its operation should be mitigated in some fashion or other.

Here we have millions of men in America producing things for export. They all want facilities; they all want the assistance of banking corporations; and unless you want to create but a single corporation to render this help in financing our foreign trade it is manifest that one producer will be interested in one of these corporations and another producer interested in another. They will be distributed, I assume, all over the United States. Now, tell me why you should permit one of these corporations to oppress and extinguish another? That is the only reason we passed the antitrust law, the only reason we passed the Clayton Act; and there is just as much danger that competition will be stifled or prevented as between these corporations so to be organized and which are organized to render help not to foreign citizens but to American citizens as though they were doing or intended to do their business at home instead of abroad.

This section of the Clayton Act which is sought to be repealed simply says that one corporation shall not hold the stock of another which is engaged in commerce. I assume that it is granted that these corporations will be engaged in commerce. I do not know, however, whether that is granted or not.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, they will not be engaged in commerce after an amendment that we have agreed upon is offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. If I may interrupt further, I have tried to bring in this bill in such form as would possibly minimize debate; and if the Senator from Iowa will just postpone his remarks and permit four or five amendments to be offered to go in I think a number of his objections will be taken care of, and then we will have proceeded that far along.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not only postpone my remarks, but, if they are really distressing to the Senator from New Jersey, I will entirely abandon them.

Mr. EDGE. They are very interesting, I may say, but I do not think we are accomplishing much in discussing an issue that we are already prepared to correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Jersey must allow me to be the judge of the propriety of what I am saying.

Mr. EDGE. I have yielded the floor to the Senator from Iowa with grace and willingness.

Mr. CUMMINS. I regret to take a course that does not commend itself to him, but I must conclude what I have to say, and it shall be very speedily concluded, because the Senator from New Jersey will discover when he has been here as long as I have been that these things can not be rapidly accomplished.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I must admit that I have already become inoculated with the germ of deliberation, and I am succumbing with grace and satisfaction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope that he will not be disturbed because we do not pursue—and I know we often do not pursue—a logical course in argument or discussion.

I was about to remark when interrupted by the Senator from New Jersey that section 7 of the Clayton Act forbids, and forbids only, the ownership by one corporation of the stock of another when it would stifle or restrain competition as between the two corporations or institutions. If there are many of these corporations—as I really hope there will be, if they are limited, as they ought to be, in their powers and in their purposes—there is just as much danger of stifling or preventing competition, with the usual consequences of the suspension of competition, when they are engaged in foreign business as when they are engaged in domestic business; and I can not understand the policy of seeking to exclude them from the operation of the Clayton Act, unless it is thought desirable that all competition may be prevented by the general combination of all corporations, whether they are engaged in foreign business or in domestic business.

I shall be very glad, indeed, if those who have given more study to the subject than I have are able to present such amendments as will cure some of the defects which I have endeavored to point out; and if they are remedied, if these corporations can be limited to the legitimate business which I think they ought to carry on, no one will more cheerfully vote for the bill than I, for I recognize, as I said a few moments ago, the immense importance of creating such banking institutions as will enable the people of the United States to extend their commerce and occupy a foremost position in the trade of the world.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the President of the United States in his speech in St. Louis yesterday made a statement in reference to the pending treaty of peace with Germany that is erroneous. I read a quotation as published in the public press this morning. The President says:

> Great Britain and others, as everybody now knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan.

Mr. President, the President represented our Government at the peace conference. He knows, of course, what was presented there and what the facts are; but it is a matter of history that Great Britain and the other Governments of which the President speaks did not make that secret agreement with Japan until the year 1917. Japan went into the war soon after it was declared, in 1914. At the time the secret agreement of which he speaks was made with Great Britain and the other powers, all of the German possessions in China had been captured, and there was not a German vessel free on the Pacific Ocean; so the President does not have his history on straight.

The first move that was ever made to bring about that secret agreement was made on the 27th day of March, 1917, and I challenge anyone to produce any evidence that before Japan went into the war she had any such agreement. I ask the President, in his next speech to the American people, to produce that evidence and substantiate what he said at St. Louis.

Now, Mr. President, until the conclusion of the story that I am about to relate, I ask that I be not interrupted.

"THE TROUBLED COMMUNITY."

Mr. President, somebody ought to tell the story of "The Troubled Community." The President will not, because it would cast some reflection upon the peace conference. The Secretary of State can not, because at that conference he was given neither information nor authority. The supporters of the administration dare not, because it would incur the displeasure of their great leader, whom they are so anxious to serve and so willing to obey; and so, as was once said by a famous lecturer, I have concluded to do it myself.

In the development of civilization there grew up a certain community where people of various tongues and aspirations dwelt together in comparative peace. Occasionally some member with a quarrelsome nature caused disturbance and sometimes bloodshed, but as a rule these disputes were confined to comparatively a few. These quarrels sometimes created suffering and injustice, but seldom was the entire community mixed in any one dispute. Gradually, however, the community became aware that Bill Kaiser, one of its members, was undertaking to rule the community, and to interfere with some of its weaker members. For many years Bill had been training for physical encounter. He had practiced the use of firearms beyond the possible need under any ordinary conditions. He became arrogant and obsessed with an exalted idea of his own importance. He committed many depredations, and because his neighbors made no open protest gradually became imbued with the idea that he was sufficiently powerful to dominate the entire community. After he had started to devastate the property of his neighbors, and when his real ambition became apparent, the balance of the community, after some hesitation, organized to give Bill the thrashing his conduct deserved. The battle waged with intense fierceness. The crops and buildings on a great many of the farms in the neighborhood were destroyed and devastated, but at last Bill Kaiser was overcome, disarmed, and thrown into jail.

JOHN CHINAMAN.

In this community lived a peaceful, quiet citizen by the name of John Chinaman. He owned quite a large farm and had occupied it and cultivated it for a great many years. He was known as a law-abiding, peaceful citizen, with no disposition to quarrel with his neighbors or to interfere in any way with their peaceful pursuits. Some of his land was very valuable, and Bill Kaiser, in his wandering about through the community, had looked upon John's possessions with envy and jealousy. John had never trained himself in the use of firearms or in the development of his physical powers. Physically he was a cripple, and neither he nor any member of his family had ever given any attention to the development of the manly art of self-defense.

One bright day, before his capture, Bill Kaiser went over to the farm of John Chinaman and at the point of a loaded revolver compelled John to turn over to him a vast amount of his property. John had built warehouses along his farm where it bordered upon the water. He had constructed roads and highways to different parts of it, and these had become very valuable in his farming operations. Bill Kaiser took possession of a great part of these and included in his demand the surrender of a part of John's farm called Shantung. John loved Shantung more than any of his other possessions. It contained the ashes of his father, and to him was sacred and holy. But he was compelled to submit because he was physically unable to defend himself.

Thereupon Bill Kaiser entered into possession of all this property, and he was still in possession of it at the time the community organized to overthrow him.

MR. JAP.

In this same community lived a little dark-colored man by the name of Mr. Jap. As soon as the community organized for the purpose of punishing Bill Kaiser, Mr. Jap, without any hesitation, entered at once into the contest. While the balance of the community was desperately fighting Bill in another part of the neighborhood Mr. Jap seized those possessions that Bill Kaiser had taken from John Chinaman. He drove Bill's agents and servants from the property and entered into possession himself. The struggle against Bill lasted long after the happening of this event, but it was noticed by other members of the community that Mr. Jap made no effort to assist further in the punishment of Bill Kaiser. He seemed to be entirely satisfied after he had taken possession of the property that Bill had stolen from John Chinaman and settled down to the quiet enjoyment of it himself as though he were the owner. It ought to be stated here that John Chinaman did not have very much more respect for Mr. Jap than he had for Bill Kaiser. Not only had John Chinaman been robbed by Bill Kaiser, but just a few years before the time of which I speak, Mr. Jap had made some demands on John Chinaman that were as unreasonable as those which had been made by Bill. Mr. Jap had demanded of John Chinaman certain concessions relating to some of his other farms, and, like Bill Kaiser, he had enforced his demands at the point of a loaded gun, so that John Chinaman had been robbed by both

Bill Kaiser and by Mr. Jap, and it did not give him any particular satisfaction to have the property which had been stolen from him by one of these desperadoes transferred to the other. Moreover, this Mr. Jap did not bear a very good reputation in the community. In addition to the robbery which he had committed against John Chinaman it was known that just a few years previous he had been guilty of an unprovoked and outrageous assault upon an old maiden lady who lived in the community, known as

MISS KOREA.

Miss Korea had quite a large family of relatives and numerous farms in one part of the community, where they had lived for a great many years. They had never given any trouble to the community, but, like the people of John Chinaman, they had not given any attention to the development of a military spirit among themselves. Several years before this, Mr. Jap had gone on a bear hunt. He was particularly anxious to capture a bear known as the Russian Bear, and while he was carrying on this expedition he asked Miss Korea to give him permission to use some of her roads and other transportation facilities, so that he would be better enabled to carry his supplies into the vicinity of the habitation of this bear, and thus enable him to more successfully conduct his hunt. Miss Korea, moved by a spirit of kindness, finally consented; but, much to her amazement, after the contest with the Russian Bear was ended Mr. Jap refused to give up the property that Miss Korea had permitted him to use, and after he had retained it and enjoyed its possession for a number of years he issued a decree and took possession by force of Miss Korea's entire farm. He not only took forcible possession of her property, but he treated her relatives and her tenants with savage cruelty. Miss Korea had established schools for the children of her relatives and tenants. She had published various books and magazines to be used in their education. She had also given her consent for missionaries of the Christian religion to go among her people and teach Christianity. As soon as Mr. Jap got possession of the property all this changed. He burned the schoolhouse and the books and other literature belonging to Miss Korea and her family. He threw her relatives into prison and murdered many of them in cold blood. He interfered with the work of the missionaries, destroyed their places of worship, and, so far as he could, retarded the spread of the Christian religion. Under this tenure Mr. Jap had possession of all the property of Miss Korea at the time that he drove Bill Kaiser off of the farm of John Chinaman, and he was so holding and so administering this property all the time that the struggle was going on in another part of the community between the allied neighborhood and Bill Kaiser. It was not surprising, therefore, that John Chinaman looked with a great deal of fear and dread upon conditions when Mr. Jap took possession of the property that had been stolen from him by Bill Kaiser.

JOHN BULL.

When the struggle against Bill Kaiser was over and he had been put into jail, there was a universal sentiment in the community that a tribunal should be established for the purpose of adjusting difficulties that had arisen in the struggle. There was not much difficulty in agreeing upon the judges who should meet in council and settle whatever difficulties might be necessary to settle in order to put the community on its former basis of peace and tranquillity. There was a very wealthy man who lived in the community, who had much influence with his neighbors, by the name of John Bull. He had taken a very active part in the capture of Bill Kaiser. He had farms located in nearly all parts of the community. His relatives had married the people of the other members of the community, in different parts of the neighborhood, until his family was engaged in farming and other occupations in every locality. He was one of the oldest men in the neighborhood, and while in his younger days he had been guilty of a good many indiscretions, yet in his mature years he had gradually developed a very fair reputation for industry and sobriety. It was universally conceded that he should be one of the judges of this court.

MR. FRENCH.

In the community there was a man very much respected by his neighbors, named Mr. French. He had been very prominent in the contest against Bill Kaiser, and had suffered a great deal in the struggle, and because he had thus fought and struggled and suffered, and because of his good reputation in the community, he was selected as another member of this court.

MR. ITALIANO.

Another judge selected was Mr. Italiano. He was an old gentleman who had lived long in the community and had also taken an active part in the capture of Bill Kaiser.

MISS COLUMBIA.

The fourth and last judge was a woman. Her name was Miss Columbia. She was of a rather uncertain age, but of rare beauty, and had long been a favorite in the community. She owned a very valuable farm and had always held very high and lofty ideas in the settlement of all questions in which the community was interested. Among other qualifications, she possessed a beautiful voice and had a wonderful command of language. She surpassed by far the greatest of her sex in her ability to talk. By means of the most beautiful and glittering generalities, she had laid down various propositions for the government of the community that had received the approbation and approval of all the people. While the struggle against Bill Kaiser was on, she had issued a famous proclamation, setting forth the principles upon which the contest should be settled and the community governed after the contest. This proclamation became known all over the community as Miss Columbia's Fourteen Points. In this proclamation of 14 points, there stood out very prominently the principle that in the settlement of the various controversies to be decided by the court, the title to property gained by force should not be recognized. Another proposition which all fair-minded people of the community approved and which was contained in this proclamation, was that members of the community should not make secret agreements with each other—that they should not negotiate in making agreements behind closed doors, but that all the business of the community and all the covenants arrived at should be arrived at openly. Still another proposition that gave great satisfaction to the community, contained in this famous proclamation, was that the tenants on any farm in the community should not be traded off to any other landlord without their consent. This was designated as the principle of self-determination, and although some of the landlords did not like it, the tenants all agreed that it was a fine thing.

Before describing the procedure of this court in the settlement of various questions that were brought to the front by the contest against Bill Kaiser, it might be well to say that Miss Columbia and John Chinaman had long been very good friends, and when Miss Columbia decided to enter the contest against Bill Kaiser John Chinaman followed her. He was not able to do very much fighting, because he had not been trained along these lines, but he had always been a diligent worker, and, together with many of his relatives and tenants, he went to that part of the community where the contest was being waged and did a vast amount of labor that was absolutely necessary in carrying on the contest. In fact, he did much more to assist in the real contest against Bill Kaiser than did Mr. Jap, who, as I have stated, carried his fighting against Bill only far enough to get possession of the property which Bill had stolen from John Chinaman. When John Chinaman entered the contest he turned over to Miss Columbia, to John Bull, and to Mr. French, and Mr. Italiano a large number of ships that formerly had belonged to Bill Kaiser and which Bill had been compelled to leave in the bays and inlets of John Chinaman's farm when he was called to a different part of the community by the bitterness of the contest that was being waged against him. These ships were a very valuable aid to John Bull and to his allies in bringing about the success of their contest against Bill Kaiser. It is true that Mr. Jap furnished some ships also, but they were compelled to pay Mr. Jap a very round sum to get them. So it seems that John Chinaman made some real sacrifices in this contest, while it is perhaps quite questionable whether Mr. Jap had really sacrificed anything. In fact, some members of the community believed that he was moved entirely by his desire to accumulate property for himself.

MISS COLUMBIA'S JOURNEY.

Just before the convening of this great court, Miss Columbia made a visit to the farms of the other judges constituting the tribunal. She departed from her own farm in a splendor and a grandeur never before equaled within the recollection of the oldest inhabitants of the neighborhood. She took with her a large number of servants, musicians, chefs, and other supernumeraries almost too numerous to mention. She fitted up a conveyance that was covered with glass in order that she might see and be seen in storm as well as in sunshine. She had a band to play while she paraded in review before her retinue and an orchestra to discourse sweet music while she was enjoying the product of the chefs that had been employed at a great expense for this particular purpose. She was given a great reception upon her arrival at the farms of the other judges. Mr. French and Mr. Italiano had all their people out with banners and flags to welcome her, and gave her the greatest ovation ever known to have been given to any personage, however high, within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant. John Bull surpassed the others in his entertainment of Miss Columbia. He gave her a dinner that was the most gorgeous and extravagant ever given to anyone since the community existed. She was welcomed into the splendor of a magnificent palace, where the assembled guests from all the farms of the community were there to greet her, and conducted to her place at the banquet table by numerous courtiers, "loaded down with gold lace, walking backward, and bending low." The dinner was served on plates of pure gold, amounting in value to many millions of dollars. It was the greatest tribute ever paid to anyone by wealth and splendor. Never before in the history of the community had feminine vanity for display been given such an opportunity as this.

Some of the relatives of Miss Columbia were surprised and even shocked at her lavish display of wealth in making her triumphant pilgrimage from her home to the place where the court was to sit. It was known that she was not paying the expenses of this trip from her own private purse, but that she was compelling her tenants and her relatives to contribute from their meager earnings to pay the expense of this pilgrimage. Many of them were sacrificing in various ways in order to contribute their share. Some of them had to give up some of the very necessities of life and labor hard from early morn till late at night in order to meet their part of the contribution. And while they murmured, yet they murmured in silence. Miss Columbia had great control over her people. At the beginning, at least, a large majority of them had unbounded confidence in her and believed implicitly in the various doctrines for the government of the community which she had promulgated. Moreover, ever since the beginning of the fight against Bill Kaiser she had ruled on her farm in her part of the community with an iron hand. She had promulgated various rules and laws among her tenants that required acquiescence in her actions and prevented criticism of her conduct under the severest penalty. She had even gone so far as to imprison some of her people because they had publicly uttered criticisms of her and the other landlords who were united with her in the fight against Bill Kaiser. She had not even permitted any criticism of the conduct of Mr. Jap, and with an iron hand she had controlled by a strict censorship all the means of communication in her neighborhood, so that her people were to a great extent coerced and some were even afraid to speak their minds. Notwithstanding all this, Miss Columbia's people were so anxious that the great court about to assemble should do justice to all members of the community and should promulgate in judicial decision the principles which she had so ably advocated that they were inclined to withhold criticism and to uphold her in what they hoped and prayed would be her earnest endeavor to see that these principles were put into actual application and practice. And thus, while the whole community was anxiously hoping for justice from the great court, Miss Columbia donned the ermine and, with the other judges, went upon the bench.

The community, and particularly that part of it where Miss Columbia resided, was soon shocked because the court insisted upon performing its official duties behind closed doors. Remembering the many beautiful things that Miss Columbia had said on the subject of secret diplomacy and secret covenants, and the desirability of pitiless publicity, they were deeply chagrined and mortified that the splendor and glamour of her reception had apparently mystified her and caused her to forget the things she had so long been teaching to her own people. Not only did the court, with the acquiescence of Miss Columbia, conceal the findings and judgment of the court from the public, but when the court took a short recess from its arduous labors Miss Columbia openly commanded her people not to discuss the action of the court, but to abide in silence until she should return to her home. Some of the findings that had been made by the court had been quietly obtained by some of the wealthy men who lived in Miss Columbia's neighborhood, and it was firmly believed by many of her tenants that these wealthy men had access to the secret action of the court and that they were using their special privileges for their own pecuniary benefit.

And thus it was that the great tribunal lost some of the respect in which it had been held by the members of the community, and thus it was that the course of Miss Columbia was beginning to be secretly criticized, and by some braver spirits openly condemned as not in accordance with the doctrines in which she had taught her people to believe.

JOHN CHINAMAN VERSUS MR. JAP.

Among the cases that came up for trial before this great court was the case of John Chinaman against Mr. Jap. In this case John Chinaman sought to recover the property which Bill Kaiser had stolen from him, and which Mr. Jap in turn had by force taken from Bill Kaiser. It was contended by the plaintiff that title to property can not be transferred by theft or robbery. It was conclusively shown that the seizing of the property by Bill Kaiser took place in the manner before described in this story, and that Mr. Jap knew all about it; that he had full knowledge of every robbery that had been committed by Bill Kaiser; and it was insisted by the plaintiff that as a matter of law and justice he ought to be required to turn possession of this property over to the plaintiff, the rightful and lawful owner. Mr. Jap offered no evidence; in fact, there was no dispute whatever as to the facts. A wonderful thing, however, developed in the course of the trial. While the trial was in progress it was conclusively shown that before the case was called Mr. Jap had secretly approached three members of the court with a proposition that seemed to be clearly and unmistakably bribery. It was shown that Mr. Jap had entered into a secret agreement with Judge Italiano and Judge French that when this case came to trial they would decide it in favor of Mr. Jap. It was also shown on the trial that there was a secret agreement between John Bull and Mr. Jap by which John Bull agreed to decide this case in favor of Mr. Jap; and Mr. Jap, to compensate John Bull for such action, had agreed to see that a certain farm, formerly owned by Bill Kaiser, would be given to John Bull. In fact this secret agreement between John Bull and Mr. Jap disclosed the remarkable fact that they had drawn an arbitrary line which they designated by the name of Equator, and had agreed that all property of Bill Kaiser north of this line should be given to Mr. Jap and that all the property south of this line should be given to John Bull.

More astounding than all this, however—at least in the eyes of Miss Columbia's people—was the fact that Miss Columbia acquiesced in this inhuman and unjust judgment. Her people naturally expected that when she discovered that all the other members of the court had made a secret agreement with one of the litigants as to what their judgment would be, she would denounce before the entire community such flagrant bribery and such secret agreements, and that under no circumstances would she as a member of this great court be a party to such injustice. But when she not only agreed to this decision and submitted to this injustice, but demanded that her own people should likewise acquiesce and approve the compact, they were not only astonished but dumbfounded beyond power of expression.

And so John Chinaman was compelled to pay the costs of the suit and was driven out of court a disconsolate and broken-hearted man. The farm and homestead where he had lived for so many years were by this judgment broken up and Mr. Jap given the control not only of portions of the land but the land so given to Mr. Jap was located so as to command access to the balance of John Chinaman's farm. He will not be able to go upon his own land or to bring any of the products from the farther limits of his land without submitting to whatever rule and regulation Mr. Jap may demand. The part of his farm where his father is buried has been taken from him. His holy land has been despoiled, and in his grief and agony he finds greater cause for complaint against Miss Columbia than any of the other judges. He had supposed that she would be moved by the highest ideals of justice. He had fervently believed in her proclamation of the 14 points, and when he saw the most fertile part of his farm taken from him and given to Mr. Jap he lost all respect for the civilization that Miss Columbia had so often proclaimed to be superior to his, and which he was on the point of believing to be true.

After the rendition of this judgment the court adjourned. Miss Columbia came back to her own farm and openly demanded that her tenants and relatives should give approval not only to this decision but to all the other judgments that had been rendered. Notwithstanding this, however, the murmurs of her people were great. They were not satisfied with many of the other judgments that had been rendered by this court, but the facts in the other cases were not all so clear and undisputed as they were in the case of John Chinaman against Mr. Jap. Where, in a case so plain as this, such a great injustice had been done, there was cast upon all the work of the court a considerable degree of suspicion, and when the members of the community began to analyze the work of the court they soon discovered that to a great extent the former possessions of Bill Kaiser had been divided up between John Bull and Mr. Jap, and they are wondering now whether the community, whatever may be the agreement between its members, can be safe so long as such a large part of it is divided up between these two landowners by a procedure that is so contrary to all ideas of civilization and common justice.

They remember that one of the wicked things done by Bill Kaiser many years ago was the stealing of two farms called Alsace and Lorraine from Mr. French, together with all the tenants who were tilling these farms, and they remember how through all the years that followed these tenants were restless and anxiously awaiting for the time when they could liberate themselves from Bill Kaiser's control and be put back under the control of Mr. French. They remember, too, that when Bill Kaiser was arrested all the people of the community demanded that these farms should be restored to Mr. French. They knew that this action of Bill Kaiser, although happening many years ago, was one of the causes that led up to the final strife when he was arrested and put in jail; and they are wondering whether nature will now take a different course from what she has taken in the past. They do not believe that any agreement between the members of this community founded upon such an outrageous, unjust judgment can ever hold the community together in peace. Their knowledge of the history of the past leads them to the inevitable conclusion that the future peace of the community can not be built upon such a wicked judgment, and many of them are opposed to the approval of such a corrupt compact, regardless of whatever virtue it may contain. They are fearful that the robbery of John Chinaman and the transferring of some of his farms and tenants to Mr. Jap will result the same as such things have resulted in the past, and will at some future time precipitate another terrible struggle, in which it will be necessary for the community to arrest and imprison Mr. Jap, and perhaps curtail to some extent the power and influence of the wealthy John Bull.

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask now to proceed with the consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. OWEN. Has the reading of the bill for committee amendments been completed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Chair is informed that the bill has not been read for committee amendments.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the reading of the bill for committee amendments be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the reading of the bill for committee amendments be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. EDGE. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not withdraw the suggestion until the committee amendments shall have been adopted, for there is absolutely no objection to them, so far as I am aware?

Mr. KENYON. I know that my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] was making some objections to some parts of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, whenever the absence of a quorum is suggested, there is nothing in order but the calling of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	Lodge	Phelan
Brandegee	Harrison	McCormick	Sheppard
Capper	Henderson	McCumber	Simmons
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	McLean	Smoot
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Spencer
Dial	Kellogg	New	Sterling
Edge	Kendrick	Newberry	Trammell

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ASHURST, Mr. HALE, Mr. MOSES, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. EDGE. I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for committee amendments.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 1, line 10, before the word "banking," to insert the word "in," so as to read:

SEC. 25. (a) Corporations to be organized for the purpose of engaging principally in international or foreign banking or other financial operations, or in banking or other financial operations in a dependency or insular possession of the United States, either directly or through the agency, ownership, or control of local institutions in foreign countries, or in such dependencies or insular possessions as provided by this section, and to act when required as fiscal agents of the United States, may be formed by any number of natural persons, not less in any case than five.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a few of the provisions of the bill, with the idea of getting the Senator who is in charge to accept a modification of them, at least.

No one realizes more than I the necessity of legislation that will take care of our foreign trade, but I am afraid this bill is not going to do it. I admit that it will do it to a limited extent; but our trade balances are so great that something more than the mere formation of a few banks will be required to accomplish what we all know must be accomplished if our foreign trade continues with no more importations than we have had in the past few years.

Our trade balance for 1915 was a little over $1,000,000,000. Our trade balance for 1916 was a little over $2,000,000,000. Our trade balance for 1917 was over three and a half billion dollars. Our trade balance for 1918 was a little over $3,000,000,000; and if the same rate of exportations compared with importations continues for the balance of the year as for the first three months of this year, the trade balance in our favor in 1919 will be about $2,600,000,000. To-day there are hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of manufactured goods and products of the soil waiting to be shipped from our ports of embarkation, for the reason that the countries abroad have not the money to pay for the goods, and the credit of those countries is such that something must be done by way of assistance, either from this country or from some other, before the trade can take its usual course and the foreign countries meet the demand that will be made upon their finances if the goods necessary and the goods already ordered them are furnished.

I recognize that no matter what bill we pass, whether it be this bill or some other, that will enable credit to be extended to foreign countries, it must necessarily inflate the currency of this country more than it is inflated to-day. The question for us to decide is whether that is the best way to meet the situation. I myself believe that that is the only way in which our foreign trade can be maintained; for no country on earth, outside of Japan, is able to-day to buy from America all the goods that it desires and meet the payments for those goods as they fall due; and there is no country on earth outside of the United States that really has the resources and the ability to extend credit to these foreign countries.

In passing this bill, if it is to be passed, it ought to be made at least as safe as possible. I notice, on page 4 of the bill, a provision as to the directors of the proposed banks, which reads as follows:

To elect or appoint directors, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the United States.

In my opinion, there never ought to be a foreigner on the board of directors of any banking institution in this country. I think that every director of every bank that may be established under this bill, if it becomes a law, ought to be a citizen of the United States; and I hope that the Senator having the bill in charge, when his attention has been called to this matter, will offer an amendment to correct this defect in the bill—such a proposition is unwise, and I was going to say unjustified, as far as the business interests of the United States are concerned.

No corporation shall be organized under the provisions of this section with a capital stock of less than $2,000,000, one-quarter of which must be paid in before the corporation may be authorized to begin business. The capital stock of any such corporation may be increased at any time, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, by a vote of two-thirds of its shareholders or by unanimous consent in writing of the shareholders without a meeting and without a formal vote; and may be reduced in like manner, provided that in no event shall it be less than $2,000,000.

Mr. President, there is no provision here for the payment of the other three-quarters of the capital. A bank can be organized under this bill, pay in 25 per cent of the $2,000,000, or $500,000, and there is nothing in the bill as to how the other three-quarters shall be paid or whether it shall be paid at all. It does seem to me that there should be a proviso specifically stating that the balance of the capital stock, if it be the minimum of $2,000,000, shall be paid within a reasonable time.

The national-banking act provides how deferred payments shall be paid, but under this bill there is no such provision; and 25 per cent of the $2,000,000, the amount authorized, can be paid, and that will comply with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator if I call his attention to one fact?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it will not interrupt me at all.

Mr. EDGE. I see very clearly the point raised by the Senator from Utah. As a partial answer to it—it may not entirely dispose of it in his mind—I call attention to the section on page 8, which provides that—

> Shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall not be liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporation except to the extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I was coming to. As a further evidence that the criticism I make of the bill is a just one, the part of the bill just referred to emphasizes that part of the bill I referred to before being interrupted, and both taken together means that the balance of the 75 per cent of the stock need not be paid only in case trouble comes to the bank, or in case of a failure, then the stockholders will be liable for the other 75 per cent of the stock subscribed in case it has not been paid. I can not read the bill in any other way than I have outlined.

I want the Senator from New Jersey to know that I am not offering these criticisms in a captious way. If we are going to have a bill of this kind, I want it to be as good a bill as we can make to meet the situation.

Mr. EDGE. I entirely understand the Senator's position.

Mr. SMOOT. I am in full accord with the object of the bill; and as I understand that the word "principally," in line 9, page 1, is to be stricken from the bill, I am not going to take any of the time of the Senate to discuss that question.

There is one feature of the bill of which I do disapprove, and yet I recognize the fact that if we are going to pass this legislation there is no need to begin to try to correct it, as it runs all through the bill, and that is the power that is given to the Federal Reserve Board to make regulations for the operation and management of the banks created under the provisions of the bill. Running financial institutions under rules and regulations enforced by outside interests does not make for success. Impositions upon the institutions organized, and that kind of legislation, particularly with regard to financial institutions, are anything but safe and sound. But, as I say, there is a need for this legislation, and if, after it gets into operation, the conditions are nearer normal than to-day, we can amend the law. Therefore I shall not take further time of the Senate in discussing it, and I only said that much in passing because I do not like that kind of legislation.

If the Senator from New Jersey thinks I am right in the two contentions I have made—first as to the directors of the institutions being citizens of the United States, and second as to a provision requiring the payment of the capital stock in full within a given time—I will say to the Senator that I shall take pleasure in cooperating with him in providing the necessary amendments.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment while listening to the Senator. I thoroughly concur in his viewpoint that all of the directors should be American citizens, and I have prepared an amendment to strike out "a majority" and insert in lieu thereof the word "all." Likewise——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. On the seventh page of the bill, line 13, the bill reads:

> A majority of the shares of the capital stock * * * shall be * * * owned by citizens of the United States, by corporations the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States.

I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he does not think the limitation there ought to be more stringent?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I feel that that is, from a practical standpoint, impossible. There is no way for us to control the transfer of stock in corporations. We can, of course, insist on all the directors being American citizens; but a corporation investing in the stock of this corporation may, of course, sell its stock to some other citizens of another country, and we could not help it.

Mr. McCORMICK. If we were to provide for the forfeiture of the charter in the event of the stock passing out of the hands of American citizens, I fancy the owners would be careful. We have been through an interesting experience in the matter of German-controlled corporations in this country where that control does not appear on the surface.

Mr. EDGE. I am in thorough sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Illinois; but he will probably note that the words in italics, "the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States," are a committee amendment made by the Commitee on Banking and Currency to meet, as far as they thought they properly could, the very question which the Senator has brought up.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be impossible to comply with the suggestion unless we positively prohibited any foreigner from owning a share of the stock or any interest in the bank. That could be done, but the question then arises as to whether that is the best policy.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is on that point that I should like to have the judgment of the Senator from New Jersey and the judgment of the Senator from Utah. If we are to create banking corporations for the purpose of lending American credit, is there any reason why we should not limit the interest in those corporations absolutely to American citizens?

There are a number of Senators who view this bill with some concern, as my friend from New Jersey knows, and who will support it with reluctance, if at all, and only if the powers of the banking corporation are limited. Now, what harm would be done the cause which the Senator from New Jersey would further, or, rather, what limit would be put upon these corporations as a matter of practice if their ownership were to be confined to American citizens? We are not seeking to enlist Dutch capital or British capital. There are no countries in Europe exporting capital at this time. There is nothing to be gained by the importation of European capital, is there?

Mr. EDGE. European gold, of course, would help things.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, but——

Mr. EDGE. The answer to that I shall give briefly. Of course, it must be borne in mind that we must have some flexibility to this legislation if it is going to be at all effective. I think from a practical standpoint it would be almost impossible.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] what harm can be done as long as a majority of the stock is owned by citizens of this country?

Mr. McCORMICK. I am fearful that if permission be given foreigners to own part, under cover they may ultimately own a majority, as they did in the case of the corporations to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. McLEAN. Then the charter is forfeited under the terms of the bill.

Mr. EDGE. The charter would be forfeited, under the terms of the bill, as soon as that fact was ascertained.

Mr. McCORMICK. Therein lies the difficulty, in the discovery of that fact.

Mr. EDGE. But is there not a greater difficulty in censoring completely every share of stock in every American corporation? For instance, take the bill that passed the House unanimously last week, the bill to which I referred, presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. It provides that an American bank may invest 5 per cent of its capital and surplus in the corporation. If any of that stock should be held by an alien, we would not be complying with the act. I think it is practically impossible to go to that extent, much as I concur in the thought and desire of the Senator from Illinois. Of course, it must be recognized that this corporation is dealing abroad in foreign securities. That is the object of the corporation. To attempt to confine it as closely as that I am afraid would make it unworkable. That is my only objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment already offered or suggested will in part take care of the suggestion which the Senator has made. I recognize that it does not cover the case completely, but if foreigners have a large interest, we will say, in the institution, and if they undertake to wield a power as to the policy of the institution, they would have at least to deal with all American directors. There would be no foreigner upon the board. While that amendment has not been adopted, I think there will be no question as to its wisdom.

Mr. EDGE. I will offer the amendment as we proceed with the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any question as to its being a proper amendment. I sympathize somewhat with the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. If we could have these banks American institutions, owned entirely by Americans, with none but American money in them, then foreigners would not be in a position at least to learn where our trade was and to whom we were selling.

At the present time that does not amount to very much, because we have more customers than we can furnish goods for, and not only that, but we have more goods than the customers can pay for that they want to buy. Therefore it makes no difference now; but in the years to come, when the world is back on a normal plane, when all the countries of the world will be striving for the commerce of the world and competition is keen—and by the way I want to say that it will not be many years before competition will be keener than it has ever been in the history of the world—foreigners who may own a considerable interest, an interest large enough to wield some kind of influence even with the directors, be they all Americans, would know where we were selling and where we were extending credits, and they would be in a position at least to know more of our foreign commerce than I would like to have them know.

I will say to the Senator from Illinois that perhaps it would be just as well not to try at this particular time to provide that no foreigner shall be a stockholder, because they might try to retaliate upon us in some other way. If after competition becomes keen, as it seems it will, we can then amend the law by providing that no foreigner shall thereafter be a stockholder.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if we can not get around that in this way: Since the object of the corporation is to deal in foreign countries I can not see where it would hurt to have a minority of foreigners as directors. They would have knowledge of the conditions in those countries where we traded and could render valuable assistance in the way of giving information. If they became obnoxious to the stockholders and the other directors they could be removed at the next annual meeting, since a majority of the stock will have to be owned here and a majority of the stockholders elect the directors.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill now, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, as it will be amended, will not allow any foreigner to be on the board of directors.

Mr. DIAL. Then the Senator does not think it would be well to have any foreigners on the board of directors?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think we want to have any foreigner a member of the board of directors of an American bank, the object of the organization of which is for the very purpose of assisting in the dissemination of our goods throughout the world.

Mr. DIAL. Of course, it is true that foreigners are not popular in this country, especially now, but since we expect to trade with them we ought to get the best information obtainable.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wish to say another word following the remarks of the Senator from Utah to explain what I have in mind.

There is sitting at present a subcommittee on wireless and cable communication of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has elicited some interesting facts regarding international interests and international trade, which show that if under certain circumstances American interests, legitimately enough, become allied with certain foreign interests for a specific purpose, presently they may be led to take a course inimical to the general American interests.

For example, an American cable system now runs from the Gulf ports through Panama down the west coast of South America and by land line is carried over to Buenos Aires. It is the first American cable to South America. It had a franchise or concession to communicate between Buenos Aires and some points on the Plata River. British interests, legitimately enough, I dare say, secured permission, as nearly as we can determine, in violation of that franchise to lay a competitive line between Buenos Aires and the Plata River points. Well and good. Now it is proposed by another American company which has close British connection to lay a cable from Miami to the Barbados, there to connect with the British system in order to enable the British system better to compete with the American cable newly established on the west coast. The general interests of American trade have not been consulted at all in planning for this Miami to Barbados cable. No provision was made to care for points in which Americans are interested. The British cable makers offered to supply a cable to their American associates in consideration for this connection from Miami to the Barbados.

I fear that if strong foreign interests are represented in these corporations there will grow up a community of purpose which may defeat the very object of the measure introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. I do not believe he will contend that, at this time any way, there is any urgent reason for enlisting foreign capital in these companies.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say a word with reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the directors of this bank or of these banks should all be citizens of the United States. I suggested that to the committee, as I think the chairman will remember. I do not believe that any foreigner should own or hold a position as important as that of director in an American banking institution.

I disagree with the Senator from Utah as to the ownership of stock. We are legislating here and arguing that this is an amendment to the Federal reserve act permitting what? Permitting American capital, not foreign capital, to assist and promote trade in foreign countries. If those people need our assistance in the course of trade, if they have not sufficient funds to carry on their business transactions, it seems to me ridiculous to say that we want them to help us to set up an institution to loan themselves this money. It seems to me that that argument falls flat of itself.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows from the view I expressed that I very much prefer to have it entirely American capital.

Mr. GRONNA. Now is the time to do it. I believe that in enacting a law as important as this will be when enacted we ought to exercise the utmost care. We ought to make it definite and certain that this is an American institution owned and operated by American citizens and controlled by American citizens. I believe that there is much merit in the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois. I can see no possible harm or injurious effect in the execution or in carrying the provisions suggested to this legislation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], but let us look at this thing fairly. There is no difference in our brand of patriotism. That does not have to be discussed. But if we are going to enact a measure to be really workable, it is physically impossible for us to control the situation down to a single share of stock held in some bank that might be held by a foreign citizen, or the wife of a foreign citizen holding stock in something of this character.

Let us not load the bill up to an extent that it simply becomes a dead letter. We are trying here to partially relieve a serious situation. It is admitted by every Senator, whether in entire accord with all the provisions of the act or not, that we are trying to relieve a very difficult situation in the interest of American trade and American commerce. Let us not pass an act that will be simply impossible of administration.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah whether a limitation of this sort might not interfere with our treaty obligations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I think not.

Mr. McLEAN. Suppose under treaty provisions citizens of other countries are permitted to own stock in banks located there?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in my opinion it would not interfere with any of our treaties, because this would apply to all nations alike. It would not say that an Englishman should not hold stock in the institution or that a Japanese should not hold stock, but that no foreigner shall hold stock.

Mr. McLEAN. Suppose under a treaty an American citizen in England can own stock in an English bank, but we say that Englishmen in this country can not own stock in our banks?

Mr. SMOOT. Then they can retaliate upon us and pass such a law in England.

Mr. McLEAN. Is it worth while to involve us in that complication at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the whole question. I was quite interested in reading in an English paper received the other day a proposition made by officials of the English Government that as soon as the league of nations is in operation the English pound note should be made legal tender in the United States, and instead of it being worth $4.18—being to-day's value—it would be a legal tender to pay all debts at the rate of $4.90. The suggestion was that all English money should be made legal tender in the United States and all American money shall be legal tender in England. I take it for granted that the reason which brought forth such a proposition was the low value to-day of the English pound, brought about, of course, by the conditions existing with an unfavorable trade balance against England, and because of the fact that the exchange is such that the English pound, used to purchase goods in the American market, is not worth more than $4.18.

I do not believe the time will ever come in the history of this Nation when the English pound note will be considered legal tender in the United States. We may create a thousand leagues of nations, but English paper money will never be a legal tender in the United States. The President, for the people, accepted an English league of nations, and it was done so easy I judge the thought occurred Why not make America guarantee our bank notes?

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Is it the purpose of the bill to establish our credit on the other side of the world?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not to establish our credit. It is to give the world a credit to enable them to buy goods from us.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that foreign money is so depreciated that our people will not sell their products and commodities in foreign countries because of the low value of their money, and that the purpose of this bill is to put our money behind the operations to such an extent that we shall be willing to sell to those countries. Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the object of the bill is to give credit to foreign countries, so that they can pay us for the goods which they desire to purchase from us. Let me illustrate it to the Senator from Arkansas in this way: During the war our importations from South America were much larger than our exportations to South American countries. That is why the American dollar fell so low in Colombia, for instance, and other South American countries.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. Our importations and purchases from Spain during the war were greater than our exportations to Spain. Hence the American dollar fell in value in Spain. If America had decided to pay her balances in gold, every American dollar would have remained in Spain the same value as in this country; but the Senator knows during the war every country put an embargo upon the exportation of gold and that no gold circulated from one country to another. Then, whenever the balance of trade was against us it depreciated our money in the country in whose favor the balance of trade happened to be. It happened so all over the world, and it will always happen as long as there is commerce in the world. It is just as immutably a law of commerce as are the laws of nature.

Mr. KIRBY. Does this bill put our credit behind transactions in foreign countries, so that we may deal with those people?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill gives credit to foreign countries and keeps their exchange as near par as possible; in other words, if this bill becomes a law, and there should be a great bank established under it, a bank, we will say, with a capital stock of a billion dollars, with the authority conferred in this bill there is no question that such a bank could purchase from England or from any other country their obligations, their evidences of indebtedness, bonds of any kind, and in payment for them give exchange on this country. Then there would be no gold passed, no real money passed, but there would be credit balances passed. Therefore, it would immediately make the English pound worth $4.87, because we know that English securities are good, and that such a bank would be perfectly safe in purchasing them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, for the purpose of elucidating the point the Senator from Utah is making, I desire to ask him a question. The Senator states the reason why the American dollar went below par in Spain and in South American countries was that during the war we put an embargo upon the exportation of gold. That explains, I take it, why the English pound went below par, because England placed an embargo on the exportation of gold, as did other countries engaged in war; so where the balance of trade was against such a country, they did not have the gold with which to pay for goods, and therefore the medium of payment went below par in the other country. If that is true, would not relief be brought about completely as to that condition by raising the embargo in all those countries?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it would not; because those countries have not sufficient gold. If they had the gold, then relief would be afforded, but they have not got it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take the case of America and Spain. If the embargo were raised and we could pay gold, then every dollar would be worth 100 cents in Spain?

Mr. SMOOT. And it is so to-day, because we have raised the embargo and we have the gold; but we are the only country in the world that has sufficient gold to meet our trade balances. We have 25 per cent of all the gold in the world. That is one reason why prices in this country have increased; it is for the very reason that we have so much money here.

Mr. NORRIS. The reason that has occurred, I take it, is because we have raised the embargo and have the gold with which to make our dollar good; in other words, gold is the international medium. If England had the gold, when she raised her embargo against the exportation of gold her pound would immediately go to its par value.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of that at all.

Mr. NORRIS. If the embargo is raised and her pound does not go to its par value, is not that because in the channels of business it is feared that the English pound is not worth what it says on its face?

Mr. SMOOT. This is true, I will say to the Senator. So long as the importations of England are greater than her exportations, she has got to find gold or credit in some other country to pay that difference. To-day her importations are greater than are her exportations. That is the reason why her pound is below par. She has not the gold to ship with which to pay the difference.

I want to call the attention of the Senate now to the fact of how wonderfully close the rule works.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator right on that point if that has not always been the rule and always will be?

Mr. SMOOT. No law on earth could change it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it seems to me as if by this legislation we are trying to pull ourselves over the fence by our boot straps.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are going to lend foreign countries some money, in order that they may pay their trade balances to us. That is all there is to it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall do so in just a moment.

Mr. President, why did we advance to foreign countries during the war $10,000,000,000? There is only one reason why we did it. We had to do it or not sell them the goods.

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only reason. Now, take the trade balances in favor of the United States and add them together during the years 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918 and you will find that they amount to about $10,000,000,000. It is just as natural as that water flows down hill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt just at that point, for the benefit of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I desire to say that instead of continuing to loan foreign countries money with which to buy our goods and raising that money by some form of taxation in our own country, which is the only way we can raise it, we propose under this legislation to assist business in the future by sending foreign countries goods instead of cash, and then making a profit on our goods, as I tried to demonstrate this morning.

There are several ways in which to equalize exchange or trade balances, which are the same thing. One is by exportation of gold, which we have already discussed; another is by the importation of goods; another is by buying securities of foreign countries and using them as credit to pay us for our goods. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill provides that we may buy their securities.

Mr. EDGE. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. And when we buy their securities the credit will be transferred to America with which to pay for the goods which they have bought from America.

Mr. EDGE. I now move that we proceed to the consideration of the committee amendments to the bill, so that we may get down to individual amendments which seem to be generally agreed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, before the word "banking," it is proposed to insert the word "in," so as to read:

> Corporations to be organized for the purpose of engaging principally in international or foreign banking or other financial operations or in banking or other financial operations in a dependency or insular possession of the United States—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 16, after the word "power," to insert "under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe," so as to read:

> Each corporation so organized shall have power, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe:
> (a) To purchase, sell, discount, and negotiate notes, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, cable transfers, and other evidences of indebtedness; to purchase and sell securities, including the obligations of the United States or of any

State thereof; to accept bills or drafts drawn upon it subject to such limitations and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may impose; to issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell, exchange, coin and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal security; to receive deposits; and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act or as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 15, after the word "corporation," to insert "the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States," so as to make the clause read:

A majority of the shares of the capital stock of any such corporation shall be held and owned by citizens of the United States, by corporations the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States, chartered under the laws of the United States or of a State of the United States, or by firms or companies, the controlling interest in which is owned by the citizens of the United States or of a State thereof.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest that that amendment ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. EDGE. If the suggestion does not meet the disapproval of the Senate, I should like to go through with the bill and adopt the committee amendments, and then any amendment to them or other amendments may be considered afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that this amendment be passed over.

Mr. NORRIS. If the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey should be followed we might get into such a parliamenary situation that we would be unable to amend the amendment.

Mr. EDGE. Very well; I will ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 3, to strike out "extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions. Any member bank may act as agent for any corporation organized under the provisions of this section for the purpose of dealing with any Federal reserve bank and the Federal Reserve Board shall establish and promulgate rules and regulations defining and governing transactions which corporations organized hereunder may have with Federal reserve banks, either directly or through the agency of a member bank. No such" and to insert "extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 19 of the Federal reserve act, any member bank may act as a medium or agent for any corporation organized under the provisions of this section in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, to permit Federal reserve banks directly to extend their facilities in the manner and to the extent defined in such regulations to corporations organized under the provisions of this section. No such," so as to make the clause read:

Shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall not be liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporation except to the extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 19 of the Federal reserve act, any member bank may act as a medium or agent for any corporation organized under the provisions of this section in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, to permit Federal reserve banks directly to extend their facilities in the manner and to the extent defined in such regulations to corporations organized under the provisions of this section. No such corporation, however, shall become a member of any Federal reserve bank.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey one or two questions in regard to this amendment. I should like to ask his construction of the last portion of the amendment, reading as follows:

The Federal Reserve Board is authorized, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, to permit Federal reserve banks directly to extend their facilities in the manner and to the extent defined in such regulations to corporations organized under the provisions of this section.

What will that permit the Federal Reserve Board to authorize?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, that amendment was suggested by the Federal Reserve Board following the original draft of the bill, believing that it would meet the situation better than the language stricken out just above it, which, as I recall, practically accomplishes the same purpose. I can only answer the Senator to the extent that the language implies, namely, that—

The Federal Reserve Board is authorized, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, to permit Federal reserve banks directly to extend their facilities in the manner and to the extent defined in such regulations to corporations organized under the provisions of this section.

In other words, this provision would permit, under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, member banks of the Federal Reserve System to cooperate with the corporations organized under this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I wish to ask the Senator this question: Does he think that the law should authorize greater facilities to these corporation than the present law permits to domestic banks or to Federal reserve banks in the way of extension of credit and facilities?

Mr. EDGE. I should say, generally speaking, no, unless some condition arose in connection with foreign financing which would cause the Federal Reserve Board, pursuing safe and sound banking rules, to feel that the cooperation of a member bank was helpful in such a transaction. I feel that we can leave such contingencies or possibilities to the supervisory board of the Government—the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator has given the proper construction to this amendment, and I think the Senate ought to know just what this amendment will do, if it is adopted. Under the Federal reserve act we were very careful to place restrictions of various kinds upon the Federal reserve banks, both as to the aggregate amount of credits that could be extended to a single borrower, as to the character of the credits, the time for which the credits should run, and so forth. While we were very careful to make these restrictions, because we thought they were necessary, in the case of banks within our own borders this amendment throws down the bars entirely, in so far as credit facilities to these corporations are concerned; and, as I read this amendment, it throws the Federal reserve-bank system wide open to these corporations, provided only that the Federal Reserve Board may be willing that it shall be done. There is no protection in the law for the Government; and, throwing the Federal reserve-bank system open to these corporations, controlled only by the Federal Reserve Board, it seems to me throws the Government—indirectly, it is true, but nevertheless effectually—into this quite as much as if there were a direct loaning of the credit of the Government.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. EDGE. May I read from an extract from the Federal Reserve Board relating to this section? It is not considered vital, and the only reason why it was inserted, of course, was because of the natural feeling on the part of the Federal Reserve Board that they could be trusted to meet conditions such as they relate here:

Though it is not contemplated that these corporations shall have occasion to deal very greatly with Federal reserve banks, nevertheless, in so far as one of them may make a commercial loan on strictly commercial paper to a foreign buyer payable in dollars, there is no reason that such paper should not be purchased by a Federal reserve bank, if necessary, through a member bank.

The writer goes on to say:

I do not know, however, that this particular part of the act authorizing direct or indirect dealings with Federal reserve banks is particularly vital.

I simply mention that. If the Senator feels that there is any great opportunity for a wrong application of the act through that power on the part of the Federal Reserve Board, it can be stricken out.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator will agree with me in my construction. Just let me go into the construction for a moment:

The Federal Reserve Board is authorized, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, to permit Federal reserve banks directly to extend their facilities in the manner and to the extent defined in such regulations, to corporations organized under the provisions of this section.

Mr. EDGE. There is no question that they have the power. It is entirely a matter of the regulations that the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. As I have an amendment pending affecting this provision, will there be any objection to having that offered now, so that it may be considered?

Mr. LENROOT. No; except that I should just like to complete the discussion of this matter while we are on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LENROOT. I just want to add that if it were necessary and if the Congress did deem it necessary to place in the law restrictions upon the credits that could be extended by the Federal reserve bank to member banks, there is much more reason, if we are to extend the facility at all to these corporations, why they should be subject to the same character of restrictions and limitations that Federal reserve banks are limited to in dealing with their own members.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have already suggested to the Senator from North Dakota, as he well knows, that if there was objection to this section, it could be eliminated; but I personally feel absolutely confident that the Federal Reserve Board in their regulations would only provide for such contingencies as are discussed in this communication which I have read.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I think the position taken by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is a very wise one. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question with regard to another matter.

On page 8, in the clause relating to shareholders, I wanted to see whether I understood this language as it was intended. If I understand that provision correctly, it would not make any of the stockholders liable for any of the debts of the bank, except such shares of stock as might not have been paid up.

Mr. EDGE. That is the language of the bill as it is now being considered. An amendment will be offered which will apply to that particular section, however, at which time we will have an opportunity to discuss it. I do not want in any way to stop the Senator from South Dakota from discussing it now; but I know that the matter will come before the Senate, and an amendment will be offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] dealing with that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I just wanted to say, then, that this being the case, a bank that is organized with all its capital stock paid up would not be responsible for any of its debts, so far as stockholders as individuals are concerned.

Mr. OWEN. Its capital would.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say that I agree absolutely with what the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, that the powers granted to the Federal Reserve Board in this bill are too broad.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Right in that connection, I agree with the Senator, and I think the amendment takes down the bars entirely. There is no limit except the sky.

Mr. GRONNA. No; that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. They can do anything.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. But I want to ask the Senator whether, even if that amendment is not agreed to, under the text of the bill they could not do pretty nearly the same thing?

Mr. GRONNA. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. While the language that the amendment strikes out is not so explicit, I am not sure but that it practically means that they could do the same thing, even if this amendment were defeated.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is so. It would be necessary to change the original text.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, beginning with line 1, it is proposed to strike out all down to line 24 and to insert:

Shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall be liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporation to the extent of double the amount of their stock subscription.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. I had announced to the Senator from North Dakota that I would not press any amendment that I found would require a division, because, of course, we have such a small number of Senators present to-day. That was one of the amendments as to which I informed the Senator that I would be compelled to take issue with him.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator would rather have it go over, I have no objection.

Mr. EDGE. My desire was, if possible, to dispose of the amendments we are generally agreed upon, and have go over until Monday the one or two amendments that perhaps would excite discussion. The one relating to the elimination of the Sherman Antitrust Act and this amendment are the only two I know about.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to let it go over.

Mr. EDGE. I will appreciate it.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand, it will be pending then.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that a final vote will not be called for on this bill to-day?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have these amendments ready now, if the Senator will accept them.

On page 4, lines 3 and 4, I move to strike out "a majority" and insert the word "all," so that it will read:

To elect or appoint directors, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 7, line 6, after the word "business," I move to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words:

And the remainder of the capital stock of such corporation shall be paid in installments of at least 10 per cent each on the whole amount to which the corporation shall be limited as frequently as one installment at the end of each succeeding two months from the time of the commencement of its banking operations until the whole of the capital stock shall be paid in.

I will say to the Senator that those are the exact words of the requirement of the national banking law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 6, after the word "business" and before the period, it is proposed to insert:

And the remainder of the capital stock of such corporation shall be paid in installments of at least 10 per cent each on the whole amount to which the corporation shall be limited as frequently as one installment at the end of each succeeding two months from the time of the commencement of its banking operations until the whole of the capital stock shall be paid in.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have two amendments to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6 of the printed bill as reported by the committee, it is proposed to strike out paragraph "(d)," lines 12 to 17, inclusive, in the following words:

(d) Corporations organized under authority of this section may be granted permission by the Federal Reserve Board to exercise any or all of the powers specified in section 11 (k) of the Federal reserve act in so far as the exercise of said power may be necessary in the conduct of the foreign or international business engaged in by such corporations.

Mr. EDGE. I might explain that that amendment strikes out the provision on page 6, lines 12 to 17, which gives fiduciary powers to these banks. As I stated in speaking on the bill this morning, I see no reason why a bank engaged in foreign financial operations of this kind should need that power, so I am striking it from the bill entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, the following: Amend page 1, line 9, by striking out the word "principally."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 3, after the word "however," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "surplus," on line 6, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no corporation organized hereunder shall invest in any one corporation an amount in excess of 10 per cent of its own capital and surplus, except in a corporation engaged in the business of banking, when 15 per cent of its capital and surplus may be so invested.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that the Senator has no objection to that.

Mr. EDGE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to which I think there will be no opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Every banking corporation organized to do foreign banking business under the provisions of this section shall, for the purpose of taxation, make reports to the Federal Reserve Board and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at such times and in such form as they may require, including a true report of the names of the actual stockholders of such corporations and the amount of stock held by each, and all such corporations organized and transacting business under the provisions of this section shall be taxed and shall pay, in accordance with the laws of the United States imposing taxes and penalties on banking corporations, into the Treasury of the United States taxes at the same rate and in like manner as is paid by other banking corporations transacting business in the United States and required to pay taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from North Dakota believe it is wise to compel the banking corporations to make their reports to the Federal Reserve Board for taxing purposes? I will say to the Senator that under the law they are compelled to make reports to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I know of no other institution that has to report to any other authority.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator knows that Federal reserve banks pay no taxes, and I want these banks doing foreign business to be taxed the same as the banks outside of the Federal reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I am in full sympathy with the purpose the Senator has in view.

Mr. OWEN. The purpose which the Senator from North Dakota desires can be accomplished by having reports made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That is the point that I think the Senator from Utah is making.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe it would be wise to have them make their reports in duplicate, making report to the Federal Reserve Board and making a like report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice in the amendment offered the taxes are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. I understand they are to be taxed under State laws in the States where they may be doing business.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; local taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it the intention that these corporations shall pay like taxes to the States where they may be doing business?

Mr. GRONNA. I think it would be wise to add that these banks shall pay taxes in accordance with the laws of the United States and of the States.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to have the amendment simply provide that these corporations shall pay taxes the same as other tax-paying corporations of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. "Or other member banks." Why would it not cover it to say "the same as member banks of the Federal Reserve System"? As I understand the amendment as it is drawn, it only contemplates the paying of taxes to the Federal Government, and of course they pay taxes under some of our excise laws and probably other banks have to pay them. All member banks are taxed under the State laws.

Mr. OWEN. I make the suggestion to the Senator that these banks will not be distributed throughout the United States. They will necessarily be in New York, Boston, and San Francisco. They will transact not a domestic business. They are not permitted to receive domestic deposits. They would only receive foreign deposits. Therefore, since they would deal exclusively in foreign commerce, I hardly think they should be subject to taxation in New York State and California.

Mr. NORRIS. We have no Federal law that taxes banks except as they are taxed under internal-revenue and excise laws. We do not levy taxes on them.

Mr. OWEN. They pay an income tax, do they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. If these are corporations in the United States, and they will be incorporated under the Federal law under this act, the present revenue act will tax them unless we specifically exempt them. We are not exempting them from taxation in this act.

Mr. EDGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to be doubly sure and have an amendment put in so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. EDGE. I tried to make clear this morning exactly what the Senator from Utah has now referred to, to the effect that I thought and lawyers feel, many of them at least, that a corporation organized under this act would be taxed in every way that any other similar corporation is taxed if there is nothing said to the contrary. In other words, we define it when we exempt, and when we do not define it they are not exempted.

However, as the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Utah state, we want to make it doubly sure, and inasmuch as no one wants them to escape any taxation, State or Federal, I am entirely satisfied to have language inserted to make it clear; but I do not want to have it involved.

Mr. NORRIS. I only make my suggestion on the theory that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota would not tax them the same as other banks are taxed in the States where they do business. It may be the Senator from New Jersey is entirely right. I am not arguing that proposition, but it seems to me if we put in here a provision we ought to say something to the effect that they shall be taxed like other banks in the Federal Reserve System. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] makes the suggestion that these banks, located in New York and similar places, will be doing a foreign business and therefore ought not to be required to pay any State taxes. That is true; every man who does business, if he goes to New York or Boston or Baltimore, is subject to the taxes levied on the business at the place where he is located, but that is no reason why they should be relieved from taxes that other corporations doing business in those cities have to pay to the States. They ought to be taxed like any other banks. There ought to be no exemption about it. If they are located in New York they get the protection of the laws of New York, and they ought to be required to pay a tax to the State of New York the same as any other corporation doing business in that State.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I suggest to the Senator there is likely to be confusion if he tries to define the time and place and where the corporation is to pay taxes, whereas if nothing is said about it, under the ordinary operation of the tax laws, the tax that they ought to pay will be imposed by laws already existing.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why try to define it at all?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that there is a serious question about it. I have looked into the question quite thoroughly.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that if the amendment were simplified so as to state that the banks incorporated under this law shall pay taxes the same as member banks in the Federal Reserve System, that would cover it.

Mr. GRONNA. No; it would not cover it because the Federal reserve banks pay no taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; the member banks pay taxes.

Mr. GRONNA. The member banks may do so, but not the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I said, the member banks of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. GRONNA. I will modify my amendment and add after the words "United States" the words "and the State laws."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

Mr. GRONNA. After the words "United States" add "and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such banking institutions may be located."

The Secretary read as follows:

Every banking corporation organized to do foreign banking business under the provisions of this section shall, for the purpose of taxation, make reports to the Federal Reserve Board and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at such times and in such form as they may require, including a true report of the names of the actual stockholders of such corporations and the amount of stock held by each, and all such corporations organized and transacting business under the provisions of this section shall be taxed the same as member banks of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest that the Senator make it read "shall pay taxes into the United States Treasury."

Mr. GRONNA. I will withdraw the amendment for the time being and will offer another amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to say to the Senator from North Dakota that this is a Federal incorporation and it gives the State the power to tax it, does it not?

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator from South Carolina that he does not know and I do not know and no one else knows whether it is going to be a foreign corporation or a corporation of this country; but we all know that they will get immunity and be exempt from taxes under certain laws which I do not care to mention at this time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is not the point I am making. The point I am making is that, if it is a Federal corporation and we subject it to a State tax, could not the State, having the power to tax, tax the Federal corporation out of existence?

Mr. NORRIS. If they were taxed like national banks, that ought to be satisfactory. National banks are taxed in the various States in which they do business, and ought to be. Nobody ever contended to the contrary, so far as I know.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It seems to me you are going to get these definitions to the point where you will not know what they mean.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, is there any amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 12, after the words "Federal Reserve Board," strike out the period and insert "or the Attorney General," so that it will read:

Which suit shall be brought by the United States at the instance of the Federal Reserve Board or the Attorney General.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no objection to it, so far as I know.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 2, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

No corporation organized under this act shall engage in commerce and trade, or deal in commodities or foodstuff, or as a condition of extending credit dictate or attempt to control the buyer or seller in the disposition of commodities, or interfere with the freedom of competition in the sale of commodities.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment, but I think it is covered by a provision in the Clayton Act. These banks are presumed to be organized for the purpose of financing American trade, and I do not feel that they should have the power to deal as banks in any commodities except those involved in strictly a banking business. I think the amendment will remove some of the objections and the confusion which seem to exist among some Senators as to the object of the bill. It seems to me the amendment would successfully dispose of any feeling that a corporation under this act could engage in any business in the world but that of financing American business men so that they can do business abroad.

I am not going to press the bill to a conclusion to-night because of the absence of a Senator who stated to me that two other amendments are to be submitted by him.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask whether the amendment which was sent to the desk by me was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to draw attention in closing the running debate on the bill to the fact and have this thought go through to the Senate, that this bill is unquestionably designed to help what might be termed medium class business, small business, and certainly not for those large corporations that seem to worry the public in many ways. In other words, a concern like the International Harvester Co. or the Standard Oil Co., and those large corporations have their export departments and have had them for years, have no trouble in financing them. Their resources seem to be practically inexhaustible. So I want the thought to impress itself upon Senators that this bill is to assist the average business men of the country.

I shall not take time now, as I presume I will have to speak on the bill generally before it reaches its conclusion, but I have not dozens but hundreds of letters from average small manufacturers in practically every State in the Union, who have seen something about the bill in the public press and who say it is meeting their situation and their condition, and asking if it were not possible for Congress to hasten the legislation so that they could fill the orders that they have from abroad. I feel that the importance of the legislation is so keen and so urgent that I trust on Monday, when we consider the remaining amendments, whatever the official status may be, we can hasten the bill to a conclusion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey the advisability of striking out, on page 5, line 5, all of that line after the word "act," down to and including the word "business" in line 8; in other words, to strike out the following:

Or as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

I am not going to detain the Senate to speak at length upon it, but it seems to me that we ought to know exactly what are the banking laws of those countries, colonies, dependencies, and possessions in which we expect to transact business before we authorize the banks to do business or to have the power conferred upon them that their banking laws may confer.

Mr. McLEAN. Has the attention of the Senator from Utah been called to the reasons given for that by the Federal Reserve Board on page 3 of the report of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not read it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Harding says in that letter, referring to the provision to which the Senator has just called attention:

This latter power is absolutely essential in order to enable these corporations successfully to compete with foreign institutions of a similar character.

I think we ought to be very careful about striking out that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know something about the reason why the clause should be retained. I think we have conferred powers enough upon the corporation as it is. We do not know what powers this would confer upon those institutions. There may be no limitation upon the loans in those countries.

Mr. McLEAN. In any event these powers are confined to similar powers exercised by foreign corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I object to.

Mr. McLEAN. Unless these institutions are permitted to exercise any rights now exercised by foreign institutions doing the same business, in the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board it is practically destroying the value of the bill. I for one hope that the author of the bill will object to any change in that provision at present.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say I know of some countries whose banking laws are just as lax as they can possibly be, and there is no restriction upon the amount of loans which can be made. If the capital stock of a bank is $100,000, there is no restriction upon that institution lending $200,000 to one person, if they desire to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, the Senator from Utah understands that it is all to be under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I know; but you can not run to the Federal Reserve Board every time you undertake to make a loan.

Mr. EDGE. Why should we assume that a banking corporation incorporated under this act, even though the banking laws of some country in which they are doing business through a branch were liberal beyond what we consider safe banking, would weaken its own structure by competing on any such conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. That is easily answered, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. But I want to take the other side of the picture.

Mr. SMOOT. Because we assume it in every banking corporation that is incorporated in this country. We place the restriction and say just how far it can go; and if the restrictions were not there, I will say to the Senator, there would be no limit to what might be done by the banking institutions.

Mr. EDGE. And they do with us just the same. The other countries place restrictions on our transacting business in their country.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of countries that have no limitations upon the loans that may be made.

Mr. EDGE. In such countries I think we can safely trust the directors of a corporation organized under this law that they are not going to invest where it is absolutely unsafe. What do they do, anyhow? Let us get down to a practical basis. They take a mortgage, perhaps, on a plant. What they naturally do is to investigate the value of such securities. So I can not see that we need have any fear as to this being too liberal; and surely we want to give them the same privileges that competitors have in those countries when they will inure to their benefit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, suppose there happened to be no limitation on the banks of a foreign country in lending money upon real estate. Under this bill the banking corporation will have the right to lend money upon real estate and upon personal security. I do not know that a bank would lend on such security the amount of its capital permitted by foreign law; they may keep within the restriction provided by the law in this country; but, there being no restrictions in other countries, they may lend any amount upon real estate which they desire. It is only for safety, Mr. President, that I suggest the amendment, and I am perfectly willing to give the question more consideration.

Mr. McLEAN. I suggest to the Senator that his amendment go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire it to go over. I have only suggested it to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be very glad to look further into it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey, if he does not expect to press his bill to passage this afternoon, if he would be willing to have it temporarily laid aside, retaining its position as the unfinshed business?

Mr. EDGE. I shall be very glad to do so, and I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

DISCOUNT OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1908.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there seems to be a little misunderstanding about this matter. I can not support the bill to which the Senator from Georgia has referred as it is now before us. There must be one or two amendments made to it before I can give it my support. The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] came to me not an hour ago in reference to the bill. It was not expected that it would come up this afternoon, and he spoke to me concerning an amendment which he desires to offer. He was, however, obliged to leave the Chamber. I do not want to be unduly insistent about this matter, but I regard it of such importance that I think the bill should go over until a more opportune time when there can be a fuller attendance.

I realize that this bill is very near to the heart of my friend, the Senator from Georgia, and I have a delicacy about even insisting upon the objection; but I can not consent that the bill be taken up at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I, too, have talked with the junior Senator from Nevada in regard to the amendment which he desires to offer to the bill.

There are three provisions in the bill. One has reference to cases where goods have been sold and the draft is drawn with the bill of lading attached, the goods having been shipped. Until recently such drafts have been cashed by banks without their being charged against the limitation that only 10 per cent of a bank's capital stock could be advanced to one person, upon the theory that it was not an advance at all but a cashing of a sight draft. It simply transfers the money from the local bank to New York, as a rule, or to some other center where the draft is met. That is the first provision of the bill.

The second provision allows an advance where the amount is 110 per cent of the advance and the commodity serving as the security has been sold.

A third provision has reference to live stock and limits the advance upon live stock in shipment to 25 per cent of the capital stock of the bank and requires the live stock to be insured before the advance can be made. The amendment sought by the Senator from Nevada was to strike out the requirement of insurance. I have his amendment here in my hand. I talked to him about it, and told him that; after conference with a number of persons, I found the general opinion was that the insurance ought to accompany the advance——

Mr. SMOOT. It must accompany it to make it safe for the bank.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That I felt sure that it should be required and that the bill could not pass if that requirement were stricken out. The Senator told me, finally, that he would not insist upon his amendment.

I leave the city to-night to fulfill an engagement that compels me to go, and I must be away until the latter part of next week. The first part of this bill is very important just at this time to a large number of my constituents where cotton is beginning to be moved. It has always been the practice in the sale of cotton to draw a sight draft with the bill of lading attached against the mill that buys the cotton at some other point, and the money simply goes at once to the credit of the bank cashing the draft at the point of delivery.

The bill was unanimously reported by the House committee and was passed unanimously by the House. It has also been, I think, unanimously reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. I do not believe there is any objection to the bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] had in his mind that it would involve inflation, but none of its provisions in any way permits the use of additional credits from the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I do not think the report on this bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency was unanimous. It met with the approval of that committee, but I do not know whether there was more than a majority of the committee present at the time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this bill was presented to me by the clerk of the committee. I was not able to be present in the committee, because during the last few weeks I have either been engaged on the Foreign Relations Committee or on the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee having under consideration railroad legislation. It was therefore impossible for me to attend the meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee. I feel, however, pretty deeply about this subject, and I think the bill had better go over until Monday. I do not want to inconvenience the Senator from Georgia, and I certainly do not want to do anything that is going to inconvenience the commerce of the country or any section of the country in any particular, but there are some provisions of this bill which have been added, one of them to the law which was enacted about a year ago, providing an extension of the amount of money that a borrower can get from a bank from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of its paid-up capital stock and surplus.

Everyone must concede that we are now in the midst of an era of inflation, and there is going to be a day of reckoning come some time. I do not know when it is coming, but I do not feel justified at this moment in consenting to a bill of this kind to go through which permits of these large extensions. I myself have had some little experience, and I have had my fingers burned at least once in this kind of banking, and I have not any use for it. I think that we shall conserve the interest of the Federal reserve system and the interest of the borrowers from the banks as well as the depositors of the banks if we haste a little slowly when it comes to granting extensions of this kind.

If the bill can go over until Monday, I will look into it further, but I do not feel justified in allowing it to be taken up at this time, when there is such a small attendance present.

I do not mean to doubt in the least the statement which was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] with reference to his conference with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], but I had my talk with the Senator from Nevada with respect to this amendment an hour ago while he was sitting right here by my desk. It may be that I have misunderstood him. I do not know whether my conference was before or after that of the Senator from Georgia, but I think under the circumstances the bill ought to go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I insist upon my motion that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill. I have stated that I can not be here on Monday.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me? I yield, if he does.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will understand that it requires unanimous consent to take up the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unanimous consent has been given to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business, and thereupon a motion to consider the other bill is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that if the bill he desires considered is taken up by a motion it will displace the unfinished business, unless it is——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Disposed of or withdrawn.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless it is disposed of or withdrawn before adjournment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that I will request that it be withdrawn before the close of the day if it is not disposed of, because I do not desire to put it in the way of the other business.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the very fact that the motion is made to take it up displaces the unfinished business.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. When the absence of a quorum has been suggested, is there anything in order except the calling of the roll?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harrison	New	Sheppard
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Dial	Lenroot	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Fall	McKellar	Owen	Smoot
Harris	Moses	Pomerene	Warren

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are detained on public business.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 6, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story
Gathers 'round its head sublime.

Father in heaven, we bless Thee for all who walk in the spirit of the cross, those who bear outwardly the blood-red emblem of service, and, above all, those countless ones who bear the sign in their hearts whatever their name or creed. May we disdain to glory save in the spirit of that symbol, not merely the cross of resignation, but the sublimity of patient helpfulness and the victory of just conflict.

O God, we remember the rows of little white crosses in France and Germany, and know that those who are there sleeping the years of their manhood away laid down their lives for our country's sake and the redemption of the world. Let us see to it that they have not died in vain. O God, we image the cross that rose on Calvary and behold there the consecration of our humanity to Thee, and from Thee the reach down to us of a never-dying, all-enduring grace.

At the close of this week accept us, Lord, just as we are, with all our sin, yet with Thy cleansing forgiveness shining upon us through the open windows of our repentance and our faith. With the Sabbath before us may we rise above the influences of this world and above our shame in a new dedication to the highest and best—and quiet our restlessness in Thee—and lose our selfishness in the love that will not let us go.

In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGAL HOLIDAY ON SEPTEMBER 17.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 100 be reported to the House for information, after which I demand unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 100 be read for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution 100.

Whereas arrangements have been made for a grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in the District of Columbia on Tuesday, September 16, 1919; and

Whereas the President, by proclamation, has declared that day a legal holiday in so far as the governmental departments are concerned; and

Whereas the various business houses and other institutions in the District of Columbia have made arrangements to close in order that their employees and others may participate in the celebration; and

Whereas under the laws governing the banking business in the District of Columbia it will be impossible for any of the banks to close on that day without action of Congress declaring the day a legal holiday: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Tuesday, September 16, 1919, being the day of the grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces, is hereby made a legal public holiday in the District of Columbia to all intents and purposes in the same manner as is Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, and the first Monday in September as are now by law public holidays.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming what would become of the President's proclamation about that holiday on the 16th, proclaimed by the President?

Mr. MONDELL. I presume in the meantime the President will modify his proclamation or order applying to the 16th and issue a proclamation covering the 17th, if in fact that becomes necessary after Congress acts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this a joint resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. This is a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the resolution, omitting the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it as indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Tuesday, September 16, 1919, being the day of the grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces, is hereby made a legal public holiday in the District of Columbia to all intents and purposes in the same manner as is Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, and the first Monday in September as are now by law public holidays.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolution, page 2, line 3, by striking out the words and figures "Tuesday, September 16" and inserting in lieu thereof "Wednesday, September 17."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL: Page 2, line 3, strike out the words and figures "Tuesday, September 16," and insert in lieu thereof "Wednesday, September 17."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the adoption of the resolution as amended. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the preamble. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the fact that the title should be amended.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the title be amended to conform to the text of the amended resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the title be amended to conform to the text. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], delivered before the National Federation of Postal Clerks on Labor Day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech of his colleague [Mr. MADDEN], delivered before a delegation of postal employees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 249.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of H. R. 7417, a bill to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and open railroads in the Territory of Alaska and for other purposes.

That there shall be three hours' general debate on said bill, one-half of the time to be controlled by Mr. CURRY of California in favor of the bill and one-half of the time by those opposing it; that at the conclusion of the debate the bill shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule, whereupon the bill shall be reported to the House with such amendments as have been agreed upon, the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to the final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a committee amendment in line 8. Insert, after the word "be," the words "not exceeding," so that it will read "not exceeding three hours of general debate."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that he also ask unanimous consent to amend, so that the debate shall be confined to the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, there is no objection to that amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that it be incorporated.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to get five minutes some time to-day to speak, not on this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I will yield the gentleman five minutes during the consideration of the rule.

Mr. SCHALL. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the consideration of two amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments by Mr. SNELL: In line 8, insert, after the word "be," the words "not exceeding." In line 9, after the word "bill," insert "the debate to be confined to the bill."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to these amendments?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know whether that is the right place or not, but I think it will accomplish the purpose which we have in mind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. Merely for the purposes of the record, is it necessary to get unanimous consent in the House in order to amend the report of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked unanimous consent, and so the Chair put it in that way. The gentleman might have made a motion if he had preferred to do so.

Mr. HICKS. It is not necessary to get unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary. The gentleman probably thought that was the shortest way.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of H. R. 7417, which bill authorizes $17,000,000 additional for the completion of the Alaskan Railway. The original appropriation was $35,000,000, but it is said on account of the increased cost of labor, transportation, and materials that the appropriation is not enough to complete the railroad. At the present time there are practically 227 miles completed on one end and about 100 miles on the other. There is the intervening distance between of about 100 miles for which no provision is made, and this bill provides for this and the completion of the entire work. This resolution is offered at the unanimous request of the Committee on the Territories, and as far as I know there is no opposition to it either in the Committee on the Territories or in the Committee on Rules. Unless the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] wishes some time, I will simply yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] five minutes and then move the previous question.

Mr. POU. I will ask the gentleman from New York to make the arrangements concerning time with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. I suggest that the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, there have been so many inquiries and comments since my vote a week ago Thursday against granting the permanent rank of general in the United States Army to a certain knight of the British Empire, listed in the English "Who's Who" as Sir John J. Pershing, that I feel it incumbent to set forth some of my reasons for that vote. As a member of the Rules Committee I voted for the rule to bring the matter before the House, that Members might have opportunity to express themselves. But as a Member of this House, on behalf of the brave officers and men, dead and living, who fought this war, I felt it an obligation to enter their protest. I have talked with men who had intimate chance to observe Pershing in the Philippines; I have talked with officers and men who accompanied him on the ill-conducted fiasco, the trail of the lone bandit in Mexico; I talked with hundreds of soldiers in the recent war, and their opinion, officers and men, was unanimous that he has not the elements so mixed in him to stand before them a man and a soldier in whose elevation they, would feel honored.

A soldier who can not stand the acid test of brave comrades must lack judgment, justice, courage. The only Army men I have heard applaud him are his puppets, who owe their present positions not to efficiency or bravery in action but to service in his behalf, and who would personally profit by his elevation.

Any soldier who ranked him or showed ability, individuality, or a dangerous tendency to think for himself was eliminated by his imperial order, that no one might divert a beam of light from the great man. I realize that in voting as I have I am not chiming in with the Pershingally conducted, cable-trained chorus, but I have had opportunity to follow this man, his methods, and mode of action when he was far away from the observing and critical eye of the folks back home, under no restraint and guarded from comment because of his domination of all news service to America, with absolute power in his hands—a far different personage from the press-made idol which his own exploiting has projected across the imagination of America.

With the aid of the Creel bureau and the visiting bureau Pershing built up a colossal advertising and propaganda machine, the like of which the world has never seen. Censored by this man and his subservient and adulatory agents, we have been dished out just such information with just such flavor as his policy dictated. Soldiers dared not talk or write. Cables were controlled. A mawkish, un-American sycophancy, fostered by mediocre men, has lick-spittled and mowed till it is no wonder that Members of Congress have been deceived. Misinformation, hypocrisy, and pretense are his guns. He used the country's blood and agony to promote his own political ends. The press of the United States had only hand-picked information and were hog tied by this outfit. Nothing got by that did not glorify the great man.

He had a newspaper of his own, paid for by the public money—The Stars and Stripes—run by one of the general's staff, Capt. Vishniski, a Pershing bootlicker, whose policy and purpose was to properly mold and instruct the mind of the doughboy in the greatness and humanity of his general. Magazine writers and newspaper men, who would write according to form and suffer their work to be censored by his bureau, were received with open arms and every courtesy, but those whose speech or writings he could not control were taboo. The country will soon be resounding from coast to coast, in news and editorial, with the praises of the returning hero.

The Washington Post, whose editorials are without peer for honesty and conservative thinking, led off Wednesday, September 3, with the following editorial, which sentiment will be reiterated from one end of the country to the other. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read the editorial which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

There will be critics, as there always are, but their puny complaints will be so feeble in the great chorus of applause that little heed will be paid them, and they will serve only to emphasize the warm thankfulness of the Nation to a public servant who had a great task to perform and who did it greatly.

There are those who believe that Pershing is coming home to even greater honors; that he will follow in the footsteps of Grant and succeed to the Presidency. That, however, is an outcome which is purely speculative. There is considerable talk in and out of Congress of nominating Gen. Pershing on one ticket or the other, but it can not be said that political sentiment has yet crystallized about his name. Nor can it be said that any word has come from him indicating an ambition for civil honors or whether he would consider entering a presidential campaign. It is known that politicians have gone to Paris with the hope of learning the commanding general's views on politics, but each time they have returned silent, indicating that they learned nothing or, if they did, were pledged to secrecy.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, "the footsteps of Grant!" Grant was a soldier and a humane man, whose soldiers loved him for his red-blooded Americanism, and for his service to his country. Before we rush this man into the Presidency as his agents and representatives, while truth was chained, have rushed his generalship, let us hope the people may get some truth as to his character and ability. Why this unseemly haste? The generalship could have waited till Congress could have investigated his actions in the recent war as to what he did to deserve this high honor. Let us find out whether he is a good, red-blooded American who would protect America's traditions and liberty, or whether he is tainted with the militaristic, tyrannical, aristocracy rule of Europe.

Pershing a candidate for the Presidency? Why, bless your soul, he has been a candidate ever since the war began.

I was in Paris during the last days of the triumphant Chateau-Thierry drive, when the splendid resistance of our American boys stopped the onrush of the German arms, undefeated in four long years of war, flushed with victory, acknowledged the most wonderful war machine the world had ever known. The brilliant courage of our boys ran like an electric spark to the flagging spirit all up and down the allied line, stiffening their morale, and bringing back hope, turning the tide from defeat into victory. It was their tremendous courage and endurance, their drive, their breed, their adaptability and resourcefulness under danger, that won. At the conclusion of an address in Minneapolis some time ago on what our boys had done to win the war I was asked, "Don't you think the wonderful planning of Gen. Pershing won this war?" The injustice and unfairness of this remark, inspired by the propaganda whose authorship I well knew, so incensed me that I replied, "Hell, no; it was the unparalleled courage and tremendous resourcefulness of the American officers and men at the front that won the war, despite the deplorable blunders, inefficiency, and lack of service of the general headquarters."

Floyd Gibbons, an able writer and a brave man, war correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, conspicuously wounded while at the front during the Chateau-Thierry drive, was personally selected by Pershing to represent him, and sent back to the United States to feel out, and if opportune, to launch his boom for the Presidency. I talked with a gentleman to whom Gibbons had shown, when, in a mellow mood, a letter from Pershing, designating Gibbons as his personal representative authorized to speak for him, giving him full scope to act. On Gibbons's return, the Chicago Tribune immediately set up a boom for Pershing for President, whose echo was heard throughout the country. Pershing clubs sprang up in a few isolated instances.

Gibbons's lecture tour was a thinly veiled camouflage for just that one thing, to start the Pershing presidential boom. The seeds sown at that time bore fruit right in this very body, in the words of a Democrat, the gentleman from Mississippi, who the other day proposed that Democrats and Republicans unite and unanimously nominate him for President. And cables from Paris were announcing that this modest, crimson-tipped flower might be faced with the possibility of being forced to run for the Presidency. We can see him putting the crown by, with the back of his hand, thus. If he is relying on the 2,000,000 votes of the American Expeditionary Forces to force him, let him have no uneasiness. Among those voting against his elevation were two enlisted men. Other soldier Members who voted for him served in another country, under different command, far removed from him.

To-day in France as chairman of a subcommittee of this House to investigate the unwarranted expenditures of money, wanton waste and destruction of war material, treatment of our soldiers and unnecessary loss of life under his command, is a soldier of the American Expeditionary Forces.

I ask that the Clerk read the following news article, cabled from Paris, relative to the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, in Paris armed with the power to make a certain gentleman whom we have seen proper to honor appear before that committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

The Clerk read as follows:

GEN. PERSHING REFUSES TO TESTIFY TO PROBERS.

PARIS, August 30.

Gen. Pershing has refused to testify before the subcommittee of three of the congressional Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, which has been conducting an investigation in France.

The general's refusal led to the issuance of a joint statement this afternoon by Representatives ROYAL C. JOHNSON and OSCAR E. BLAND, of the subcommittee, in which regret was expressed that there should be a conflict between the military and civil authorities of the Government.

In a separate statement Mr. BLAND declared that the general's action was an example of the "indifference and contempt" shown during the entire war by the War Department toward the wishes of the people and their representatives.

Mr. SCHALL. The general thinks himself too great a man to be humiliated by having the use he has made of the talent intrusted to him brought in question by a dinky little congressional committee, because he could not censor their report, although this committee is armed with power he is bound to obey. A soldier disobeying as flagrantly, Pershing would shoot. It is such men as he, when they are given the power under civil authority, that seize governments. It is such temperaments that defy the power that made him, and demonstrates clearly in this very one act, if nothing else, that he is unfit to be trusted with the liberties of a free people. He is too wily a politician to allow his self-made picture in the minds of the American people to be destroyed before he has secured the indorsement of his work by the United States Congress to use in his candidacy for President, with which indorsement his promoters hope to overcome the truth which later must find him out.

The news might have got back before his generalship was a reality how he allowed $1,000,000 worth of planes to be burned at Colombe-les-Belles and wholesale destruction by fire of clothes and food, ammunition and equipment, and he might not want to be questioned about the million-dollar dugout, it was commonly rumored in Paris he had constructed for his own safety in case the enemy should succeed in breaking through so far to the rear. He might be asked why he did not remove Brig. Gen. Harts, one of his promoted favorites, for unfitness with reference to the prison camps—Rue St. Anne, the Bastille, De la Rouquette—filled with wounded boys who had offered their lives to their country, and whose only crime was that they had taken French leave from the dreariness of the grounds of the hospitals and had been caught at it and sent to insanitary, overcrowded prison camps where they were half starved, half frozen, and half clothed, and where sergeants under the command of Brig. Gen. Harts perpetrated unbearable cruelties and brutalities. Free men attempting to escape from this hell were kicked and unmercifully beaten and shot down in cold blood. Some in the last agonies of despair, realizing that the only escape from this treatment was suicide, took their own life. It was the orders of these prisons to treat men with such severity and harshness that there would be no repeaters. Pershing did not want to have the congressional committee ask where he was when the different drives were at their height, and the boys at the front were suffering starvation and torment and death. He might have to answer that he was down at Bordeaux making campaign speeches to the men in the service of supplies, furthering his presidential campaign, or up in Paris in his splendid chateau giving pink teas, entertaining royalty, far removed from the dirt and grime and carnage and danger. Trifling criticisms! Yet, they point directly to the character, which should be known by the people, of a candidate for President. Or they might ask why he was not concerned that casualty lists should come back speedily and accurately to ease the suffering and anguish of distracted parents. Why he inaugurated such a policy of indifference, with no thought or care for the welfare and comfort of his men. When the nondelivery of mail would be called to his attention would he brush the matter aside as of no importance and resay, "The men are over here to fight Germans, not to get letters"?—as if the getting of letters from home were too trivial a matter to consider. Nothing could have done more for the soldiers' morale than to hear with reasonable regularity from his sweetheart or his wife or his mother, or, perhaps, his old dad, how everything was going and know that all was well at home. There was mighty little cheer, mighty little but downright drudgery and hardship, and the one bright spot was the letter from home. When asked about nondelivery of mail would he reiterate that only a few sacksful were undelivered?

If he did not know that there was a warehouse full of undelivered mail, he had no business to be general. It was his business to be able to make truthful reports. Of course, a person so busy visiting has not much time, but a good manager or a good soldier will cut out pleasure for business. He checks up on mistakes, keeps track, holds things in line or sees to it that some one capable achieves these ends. But this man's every move is dictated by selfishness, and the test of his helper's efficiency was how strong they were for his advertising propaganda. Pershing might be asked about his flagrant favoritism and female methods throughout the army; why he delayed men deserving of advancement, and thrust ahead of them men who had yet to smell the smoke of battle. Why he was so un-American as to punish men of certain divisions for turning up their collars and putting their hands in their pockets, when not in formation, during inclement weather. Or, why were officers and men who had really done the fighting compelled to travel to port in returning to the United States like cattle when hospital trains were being used to carry personally conducted tours of kid officers from the States from Brest to St. Nazaire, Bordeaux, and thence along the front, while at the same time officers and men who had been at the base ports could not even get the privilege of seeing the battle front, even at their own expense. Or, why officers, nurses, and enlisted men at points along the battle line, as late as May, 1919, were refused transportation, through his orders, from the railroads to the points of interest while the sisters, cousins, and aunts of the Young Men's Christian Association were well taken care of. He might be asked why he reported that he had personally inspected the camp at Brest, when on that day he was at Dijon; he might have been asked if the Army nurses and doctors got a square deal in the American Expeditionary Forces and why thieves and other malefactors could not be convicted by court-martial, or if convicted got a trifling sentence. He might be asked why he allowed our boys to wallow in the mud and die like flies for lack of care, at Brest, St. Aignan, and other camps, when an order from him would have mended matters. To talk about Pershing's humanity is to talk hypocrisy. A prig, a vainglorious tinseled soldier. Humane? Why, there is not a shred of this quality in him. He said "I will sacrifice four divisions—about 125,000 men—to take Mihiel." Thank God, his estimate was far from correct. He might be asked about the reckless waste of life when he knew the armistice was to be signed. He might be asked why he would not take the advice of Haig and Foch and insisted on sending thousands and thousands of American boys to useless slaughter. Even the boys at the front knew that somebody had blundered when they were ordered into slaughter, knowing the armistice would be signed to-morrow. A good general is one who attains his objective with the least possible loss of life.

He might be asked about the order that only he should ride a white horse, so that he would be immediately recognized before the films where he did his wonderful planning and fighting in this great World War. He pictures himself a Napoleon; an equestrian figure; a general on horseback. But Napoleon would never have lost track of the whereabouts of his boys for 17 hours so that not a wheel moved, as at Avocourt, due to headquarters' lack of comprehension. Napoleon dismounted and put a wounded soldier in his place and trudged on foot from Moscow through the snow.

The Little Corporal was not too haughty to take the watch when a weary boy fell asleep on sentinel duty; when the report reaches Pershing, 60 miles in the rear, that an overworked and exhausted 17-year-old American lad has fallen asleep on duty, Pershing orders him shot. Napoleon knew details, how many bullets he had, how much ammunition. He took thought for the welfare of his men, and would never have ordered the American soldier to advance into battle time and again without artillery support, without flares, without airplane protection, without sufficient supply of common ammunition, to say nothing of food and provisions. This parlor soldier might be asked to point out just one instance where he ever exposed himself to any danger, hardship, or suffering. The hide of Pershing was always well provided for. After the war was over he did see some battle fields and put in a good deal of time laying wreaths on soldiers' graves and visiting hospitals in Paris. He might be requested to reconcile the tears that the ever-faithful and ever-present reporter sees glistening in his eyes at sight of the wounded soldiers, with his condoning the barbaric treatment of the wounded boys in prison camps; with his statement, earlier in the war:

> I can't sacrifice the room on board ship a soldier needs to a doctor or a nurse. A wounded man takes three or four to care for him. Better efficiency that the seriously wounded should die than to spend the effort in attempt to save their lives. Twenty-five per cent loss must be figured in action.

That is why he would not let bandsmen be used as stretcher bearers, though they were eager, begging to go. That is why he did not allow ambulances to be driven onto the field for the wounded, though drivers hearing the call of the helpless brave men begged to go after them, and had they been allowed to do so many, many lives could have been saved. That is why he scanted doctors, stretcher bearers, and hospital facilities at the front—blankets, covers, tents, first-aid supplies—while warehouses were bursting with these supplies. In the Battle of the Argonne wounded soldiers were gathered together by their less wounded comrades, hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of them where they lay in the rain and mud, with no blankets, not even a canvas to cover them, bleeding to death, with no one near to take care of them for 48 or 50 hours. Doctors told me time and again men's lives could have been saved if they could only have had care within 24 hours or even 36 hours. The inhumanity, the needless loss of life, the long strain of frantic endeavor to serve all of the wounded cases were driving doctors insane and taxing nurses to the limit of endurance, while thousands and thousands of doctors and nurses were pounding at the door to get across. And this was all brought about by the inhuman orders of the high command. But as Pershing says, "Sentiment has no place in this war." Then why is it the right thing for us to wade to our chins in sentimentality, pretending we are honoring the soldier?

Pershing's great force was always centered that the favorable report should go forth regardless of the fact. He would rather have a headline than to have performed some real patriotic service. From the time Pershing set foot in France he realized that he was the controller of all news to America and that he could make of himself in the minds of the American people what he would. But there came a fly in his ointment in the way of Congressmen, whose speech he had no way of controlling. Too bad there is such an institution as Congress. No doubt, were he our dictator, as he was in France, he would disband Congress. He did snub our committee—sent there to interview him—and prevented Members from visiting the army in Europe and prevented their using Army transports, though it is expressly provided by law that Congressmen shall have the right to travel by Army transport. Congressmen all remember when Pershing instructed the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to put a ban on Congressmen coming over, for should they be allowed to see and hear freely, his secret ambitions to become President would be a myth. Apropos to this safeguard and the machinery, known as the visiting bureau, he set in motion to curb this little leak. Just about a year ago Mrs. Schall and I sat in the anteroom of the office waiting to see this same notorious Gen. Harts, of evil report in connection with prison camps, and ranking officer of the visiting bureau, and overheard a brave swivel-chair soldier, Maj. Hunter, attached to Harts's staff, panning Senator Thompson, of Kansas, for nosing about and prying and trying to find out things by worming into places where he had no business. He was discussing the enormity of the Senator's crust in his insisting on visiting the prisons and the front, and said with much heat that he was a thorn in their side. They had no intention of letting him go to the front or the prisons, but he had given the chauffeur contrary orders and gone right to the trenches and muddied up a satin-lined limousine, belonging to the United States Army, they had magnanimously loaned him, so that it was not fit for a lady to ride in. Capt. Weeks, a faithful Pershingite, in charge of the visiting bureau under the command of Gen. Harts, came in to advise as to methods as to how he could plausibly block some one, whose name I did not get, who was evidently attempting to get to the front, and during the conversation remarked, "So sorry to have missed you at the party last night. We had a ripping time."

This visiting bureau was a motley collection of chair-warming, mamma-boy officers, small souled, wee moustached, white-livered, bombproof job hunters, strutting around with their swagger sticks, imitating European militarism, picked to see that no visitor got away with any facts that might not conform to the prescribed information according to general headquarters. Their purpose was obstruction, not help. There was no chance of any of these picked men taking a visitor into any dangerous place unless he countermanded their orders. In some instances they would leave the car and wait for its return to safety, to the delight of the chauffeurs, who had little or no respect for these lieutenants.

Later, in conversation, in attempting to mitigate my requests, Gen. Harts held up to me as a horrible example Senator Thompson's outrageous desire to get real information, and said, "It is not his right; it is a privilege for him to visit the Army. He doesn't seem to realize that it is only by courtesy of the Army that he is allowed to be here at all. It's just vanity that makes such fellows want to go to the front, and we don't propose to have them go back home and, for political purposes, make a mountain out of a molehill." Lucky for me I had fortunately been armed with requests from the Secretary of War, which the general was loathe to countermand. I ventured to timidly suggest that Senator Thompson might not be classed exactly as a civilian; that he was an officer of the Government, under the Constitution given the power to declare war, and, equally with Army officers, servants of and accountable to the people; that there had been only one or two Senators and comparatively few Congressmen who had been able to get over, and it would seem to me Government money well spent to show them faithfully around. And while Congressmen might be considered generally a nuisance, they ought to be shown at least the same consideration as newspaper correspondents and special article magazine writers, since they were in a way reporters for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an issue which is not much read by the public generally, but which is sometimes referred to. Gen. Harts interposed, "That's just the point." I further continued that it was my understanding that it was Congressmen who had, by their votes, instituted this war and had appropriated the money to carry it on, and would have to continue to do so, and that it would be good business, even if under the present Army interpretation they had no right, to allow them to observe, if they had the hardihood to make the venture, what was being done in the conduct of the war and the expenditure of the people's money and the treatment accorded their boys. That I understood that the people at home thought this was a war for democracy, not the aggrandizement of militarism.

Gen. Harts was simply effusing the Pershing atmosphere. Pershing had let it be known that he did not want such talebearing, interfering nuisances around as Congressmen, for he well realized there was no way to control their mouths with the vehicle they have to force a hearing from the floor of the House. No wonder he refused to go before our congressional committee in Paris at a time when his generalship might be jeopardized and thus his plans for the Presidency go glimmering.

There was no thought in the mind of this self-promoter for the common soldier. He aped the false dignity, pomp, and glory of the military caste with which he came in contact in Europe, to whom the common soldier is as dirt under their feet. We do not want that kind of stuff over here. We do not want to perpetuate it in power, and I believe, for one, in doing what I can to stamp it out. We are Americans who love America, her traditions, her institutions, her liberty, her ideals. If I had but one word to describe the American soldier, I would describe him with the word "courage." He needs no feeble eulogy of mine. His glorious deeds are an eternal and living monument. All the world knows that courage, endurance, so sublime was never seen. But I can not see how we are honoring the American soldier by furthering the political ambitions of this man, and pressing laurels on his brow to the accompaniment of mawkish, un-American, maudlin sentimentalities, putting the stamp of our approval upon this snob, this make-believe imperialist, this arch-defender of the court-martial established hundreds of years ago under the tyrannical government of England, with no thought except to exploit the soldier to his own selfish ends. He is deserving as a cold-blooded manipulator, a scheming politician, and for that I am willing to give him the palm. It is a bad policy and a detriment to the welfare of the American Army to crown a man whom every officer and man in the overseas forces in a position to know realizes is undeserving from the standpoint of either generalship or humanity. Why is it that the memory of the Army under such rules is making more Bolsheviki and anarchists and men generally disgruntled than any other one thing? You can not get a man who has been in the Army to say a good word about it. The iron of injustice and un-American treatment has been burned so deeply into his soul that the Army has become a thing he hates. This pent-up passion is bound to break loose. The older and thinking man can reason himself free; but the young blood of America of which most of the Army was made, not old enough to marshal facts to a conclusion, feels that he has been outraged by Uncle Sam, to whom he has offered everything. These soldiers and officers knowing these things that I have reiterated, and many more, feel that we are not honoring them in promoting the ambitions of the cause of their injustices. The fact that you do not hear this complaint in the Navy only points the comparison. Men in that service speak of their commanding officers with pride; speak of the service with high regard, and if trouble comes would go back in a minute.

But you can not drag the high-spirited young American back into the kind of Army the American Expeditionary Forces under Pershing stood for. We must reform the kind of men that are to command our soldiers and the kind of rules that are to govern if we are to keep in the sky the American flag and maintain the brave days and traditions of our forefathers, who did away, they thought forever, with title and rank and caste and vainglory. It might be well for us to overhaul West Point and see what kind of kaiserism they are teaching there under the American flag. In a few days we will be called on to appropriate the money to buy a gold sword to present, that the conquering hero may carry it over the country as a symbol of honor to the American Expeditionary Forces. The thousands and thousands of brave, wounded Americans who lost their lives through this man's inhuman negligence must cry out against the injustice to brave men who fought and died, to the unwitting end that some Cæsar might build his throne upon their blood, to the undoing of the libertjes of the country for which they died.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish to use any of his time?

Mr. GARRETT. I should like to explain to some gentlemen who have come in lately that this is to make in order a bill reported by the Committee on the Territories touching the continuation of the work on the Alaskan Railway. The bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Territories, and this rule was unanimously reported from the Committee on Rules. I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. In line 2, page 2, instead of a direct appropropriation, $17,000,000 is hereby authorized as the appropriation?

Mr. GARRETT. That is true.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is to go into some appropriation bill—the sundry civil bill or some other appropriation bill?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And this is only an authorization?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; it is not known how rapidly the money will be needed.

Mr. HASTINGS. It will be in order to appropriate in the aggregate $17,000,000 as needed?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; the original bill was an authorization.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7417) to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article on wheat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article on wheat. Is there objection?

Mr. CANDLER. Reserving the right to object, what is the article from?

Mr. STEENERSON. From the Warroad Pioneer.

Mr. CANDLER. A newspaper?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," be amended by inserting at the conclusion of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That in order to complete on or before December 31, 1922, the construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, together with necessary sidings, spurs, and lateral branches, the additional sum of $17,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be immediately and continuously available until expended."

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any opposition to the bill. If there is no opposition, I would like to have the ranking member of the committee, Mr. WATKINS, control one-half of the time.

Mr. WATKINS. I will control it if there is no one in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone in opposition to the bill who wishes to control the time? If not, the gentleman from Louisiana will control one hour and a half.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, in 1867 when Alaska was purchased through the efforts of Secretary of State Seward from Russia for $7,200,000, which was less than 2 cents an acre, the European nations poked fun at the United States, and the papers of the United States ridiculed Secretary Seward and referred to Alaska as "Seward's Iceberg."

The climate of the most of Alaska is better than that of Scandinavia and New England. Vegetables and cereals can be and are raised there, and it is the richest undeveloped mineral section on the face of the earth.

Time has justified Seward's purchase of Alaska for the United States. Since 1869 Alaska has produced over $840,000,000 worth of wealth; $300,000,000 of that from her fisheries, most of the rest from her mines and from her furs. In the same time Alaska has bought from the United States $400,000,000 worth of property. It has done that under existing law that practically ties up the resources of Alaska and prohibits them from being developed.

In 1914 under these conditions, knowing that Alaska should be developed and that a railroad could not and would not be built by private enterprise, the Congress of the United States enacted a law authorizing the President to construct a railroad or railroads in Alaska, not to exced 1,000 miles in length, and authorized the expenditure by him of $35,000,000 for that purpose. The President placed the construction of the road under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and he in turn organized what is known as the Alaskan Engineering Commission to take practical charge of the work. The engineering commission was composed of Mr. Edes, one of the great railroad engineers of the world, and of Col. Mears, who constructed the Panama Railroad for the United States, an Army engineer, and a Mr. Riggs, who was connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey and had control of the survey of a part of the line between Alaska and British Columbia. The war came along, and Col. Mears resigned, thinking his duty was first in the Army. About a year and a half ago Mr. Riggs was appointed governor of Alaska. That left Mr. Edes as the only remaining engineer, and he has prosecuted the work as rapidly as could be done under the circumstances. About a year ago he was taken sick and was unable to attend to the details of the work in Alaska. He has been half of the time there and the other half in Washington, in the department and trying to recover his health. Recently he resigned his position on the engineering commission and is now connected with the work as a consulting engineer. Col. Mears has been transferred from the Army and is now in control of the work in Alaska.

The original authorization of $35,000,000 would have constructed this road under ordinary conditions and circumstances, but the war came along, wages increased 59 per cent, the cost of material increased up to 161 per cent and transportation up to 147 per cent. Under those circumstances the $35,000,000 is not sufficient to complete the work. That money has all been used, with the exception of $2,038,029, which amount was included in the last sundry civil appropriation act enacted by Congress, and will all be used by the middle of October or the 1st of November. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary, unless we wish to sacrifice the $35,000,000 already invested, that this $17,000,000 authorization be allowed.

The road, when completed, will be 601 miles in length. The main line, from Seward to Fairbanks, will be 471 miles in length. The spurs and branches and side lines will make up the 601 miles. All of the road has been completed, with the exception of some work to be done to complete the first 71 miles from Seward north and a gap of 100 miles and another small gap of 25 miles. Most of the 100-mile gap has been surveyed and some of the roadbed has been made. According to the estimate of the engineers in charge in Alaska, Mr. Brown, Mr. Gerig, and Mr. Weir, and the engineering commission, a detailed statement of which will be found in the hearings, $17,000,000 will be needed. In the hearings you will find also a detailed statement of the expenditure of the $35,000,000. The $17,000,000, if authorized to be appropriated, will permit of the completion of the road by the end of 1922.

I know that the construction of this road is not going to alone develop the resources of Alaska. We have got to amend our conservation laws so far as they apply to Alaska, so as to make it possible for a man to go to Alaska, with opportunity of bettering his condition. There is no reason why a man should leave civilization and go up there when he can make just as much in Washington or San Francisco as he can in Alaska. After this bill has been enacted I am going to try to have enacted some bills that will permit of the private development of Alaska. Recently oil was discovered in Alaska, and it was all put into a reserve, with the exception of 20 acres, that were allowed to the man who discovered the oil. He is a poor man; he can not borrow money to buy the machinery and go up there and develop the oil on 20 acres, and if he could, what could he do with it? The United States Government should be as honest in dealing with its citizens as it compels them to be in dealing with each other.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman state what traffic the road in Alaska now carries and what it will do if the country is properly developed?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes. The gentleman will find that all in detail in the hearings if he will read it. I want to talk about this proposition first, and then I will come back to what the gentleman refers to. The carrying of household goods and beef and things of that kind will follow the developing of Alaska. We can not expect to develop the coal fields of Alaska under the present leasing laws applicable to that country. We must have a coal-mining law that will be at least as favorable to the people of the United States as the coal-mining law of Canada is to the people of Canada. A number of years ago there were some people in San Francisco who wanted to organize a corporation and go up into the panhandle of Alaska, put up a paper-pulp plant that would cost them from five to fifteen million dollars. The paper-pulp wood is there which would produce paper for the world in perpetuity. It grows in from 12 to 15 years—reproduces itself. It rots quickly after it comes to maturity, and it has to be used or it rots. There are splendid harbors there; the good, clear water is there. When they came to try get some consideration from a department down here, what did they find? The department wanted as much for stumpage as you have to pay for stumpage in New York, and they wanted to give a lease for only 20 years and retain the authority for the United States Government at the end of every three or five years, if the Government might see fit to do so, to refix the price of the stumpage on this wood without consulting the owners of the plant. Of course, the company could do nothing under those circumstances, and naturally they went over into Canada and there put up a $15,000,000 paper plant, where they got the right kind of consideration.

Gentlemen need not vote for this bill thinking that it is going to be all that is necessary for the development of Alaska, for it is not. Without this bill Alaska could not be developed, but with this legislation it will be possible to develop it. This road will bring into Alaska at a reasonable rate provisions that will be necessary to be used by an intelligent American citizenry.

It will bring in machinery with which they can open up the mines of Alaska—the coal mines, the iron mines, the low-grade gold, the copper mines, and silver mines. As I said in the beginning of my remarks, Alaska with her small population, since 1867, has bought from the United States $400,000,000 worth of goods, and has produced over $840,000,000 worth of wealth. Now we have up there about 30,000 white people, American citizens most of them, and about 23,000 natives. During the war 5,000 of the young men of Alaska were drafted and went over to France to fight for the United States. That left in Alaska, of course, old men, young men, foreigners, and the natives. I think that the Alaskan Engineering Commission has done very well with the money under the conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have been greatly interested in the development of Alaska ever since I have been a Member of the House. I voted to give home rule to Alaska; I also voted for this project, but I can not see where the economy comes in in constructing the railroad in Alaska, I think it is 400 miles——

Mr. CURRY of California. Four hundred and seventy-one miles.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). In sections. That is, we go and construct a couple of hundred miles and then leave a gap of some 100 miles or more, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not there is any reason for constructing a road in that manner?

Mr. CURRY of California. There is a good reason for constructing the road that way. It was the proper way to construct the road, the economical way to construct the road. The road started from Seward on the southern point of Alaska, and went to Anchorage. Part of that road—71 miles—had been constructed. From Anchorage over to the northern terminal of the road, Fairbanks is located on the Tanana River. The Tanana River is a branch of the Yukon River, and the Yukon River and the Tanana River are navigable for 2,000 miles. The Alaskan Railroad Commission commenced building from the southern point north. They brought the material to Seward and Anchorage, and they commenced to build from the northern terminal south, so that they could save time and save money, being able to do twice the work in the same time than they could if the road was built out of one terminal only. Now, if all this money had been appropriated in one lump sum instead of in driblets, so that the Alaskan Engineering Commission could have contracted at the then price for materials needed, probably this $17,000,000 would not have been necessary. But the Alaskan Engineering Commission could only contract for materials for one year at a time, because that is all the appropriation we gave them, and they did the best they could. They built from both ends to save time and to save money.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was going to ask the chairman how the population had increased since the passage of this act of March 12, 1914, authorizing the building of this railroad? I believe the gentleman stated that we have about 30,000 white people in Alaska now.

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. How many did we have in 1914?

Mr. CURRY of California. We had about 40,000, probably 50,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the reason for the occasion of the decrease?

Mr. CURRY of California. Because 5,000 of them, who were the breadwinners of families, were drafted into the Army, and because there is no encouragement offered to people to settle in Alaska.

Mr. HASTINGS. How many white people did we have there when the war came on?

Mr. CURRY of California. When the war came on we had about 35,000 or 40,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, we had about 40,000 in 1914?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. So that the population between 1914 and 1917—the beginning of the war—in Alaska did not increase?

Mr. CURRY of California. No; there was no reason for it to increase. What reason was there for a man to go there, except to work on the railroad?

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the largest city in Alaska in population?

Mr. CURRY of California. Juneau, which has about eight or ten thousand population.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask this question purely for information, as the gentleman is one of the best-informed men in the House on the subject of Alaska. The gentleman has stated that this railroad would be of some assistance in developing the low-grade mines, as I understand, of gold?

Mr. CURRY of California. Gold and copper.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Gold and copper.

Mr. CURRY of California. And iron.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will it assist in the development of coal mines under the present regulations, or will we have to wait for further——

Mr. CURRY of California. The road already reaches to the coal fields. There are 1,202 square miles of coal fields in Alaska that have been explored and experted by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Geological Survey, and by the Alaskan Engineering Commission. That is all on the line of this road. It is estimated that there are 30,000,000,000 tons of coal that will be opened to commerce by this road, and 15,000,000,000 tons of it will be high-grade coal which could be used for coking and smelting ore, and such purposes, and the rest of it for fuel and matters of that kind. In Alaska it has been estimated that there are 150,000,000,000 tons of coal. No person knows how much there is.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURRY of California. I will.

Mr. SNELL. How much would it cost to get that coal to the western United States for use down there?

Mr. CURRY of California. That coal is mined by the Alaskan Engineering Commission and sold at the present time for $6.60 a ton along the line of the road; now, you would have to add the freight down to the western United States.

Mr. SNELL. How much would the freight amount to?

Mr. CURRY of California. I do not know. I used to know that rate, but now you can not tell what freight rates are, anyhow.

Mr. SNELL. My idea was to find out how the approximate price of this coal would compare with other coal in the United States.

Mr. CURRY of California. Well, it was estimated under old conditions that this coal could be mined at from 50 cents to $1.50 a ton.

The only thing we know about the coal at the present time is that the United States Engineering Commission has opened a mine at Eska, in the Matanuska field, and, including the development and machinery and the opening of the mine and the small amount of coal they have already mined, they can sell that coal at $6.60 a ton. They have now at Ancorage about 25,000 tons. I do not know what they have along the line, but probably 75,000 or 100,000 tons.

Mr. SNELL. Is this bituminous or anthracite coal?

Mr. CURRY of California. Both. Half of it is the highest grade coal, and the other part low-grade coal.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman anticipate that eventually the United States will get some supply of this coal from the Alaskan mines?

Mr. CURRY of California. The intention of Congress in passing the original bill was to give the western coast of the United States a high-grade coal and also to supply the Navy. The Navy Department has analyzed the coal and find that it is up to grade and that they can use it. They want the road completed and the mines developed, but there are only two private leases under operation on account of the leasing law.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman thinks that if the leasing law was proper the western part of the United States could draw its coal supply from Alaska?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes. I will show you the difference between the leasing law of Canada and the leasing law of the United States. On page 98 of the hearings you will find the summaries of the laws and regulations in regard to Alaska, and also the summary of the law of British Columbia as to coal mining. They are as follows:

SUMMARY OF LAW AND REGULATIONS GOVERNING COAL-LAND LEASE IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

Qualified parties may lease coal lands in Alaska in area not to exceed 2,560 acres, lessees disqualified from holding interest in any other coal lands in Alaska.

No prospecting privilege.

Annual rental 25 cents per acre for the first year, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, and $1 per acre for each succeeding year during the life of the lease.

Royalty 2 cents on every ton of coal shipped or removed from land during the five years of lease, and 5 cents per ton for the next 20 years.

An expenditure of $20 per acre per year required by lessees during first five years of lease; bond required in one-half of the amount of expenditure for each year.

SUMMARY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA LAW TO ENCOURAGE COAL MINING.

Prospecting licenses granted for 640 acres upon payment of $100 and expenditure of $50 per year, which can be extended for three years on like terms. Any number of license holders, not exceeding 10, can enter into partnership and group their claims. The $50 exploratory work required for each claim can be done on any one of the claims so grouped.

Upon discovery of coal, lease can be obtained for a term of five years at an annual rental of 15 cents per acre.

Upon a satisfactory showing of work, lessees shall be entitled to purchase said lands, including the coal, petroleum, and natural gas thereunder, at the rate of $20 per acre.

The following is a comparison of the Alaska and British Columbia coal-land laws:

Alaska and British Columbia coal-land laws compared.

ALASKA.		BRITISH COLUMBIA.
Maximum area	2,560 acres	Maximum area	6,400 acres
Prospecting privilege	None	Prospecting privilege	3 years
		Fees and expenditures, per yr., per acre, about	23c
Lease privilege:		Lease privilege	5 years
Rental, 1st yr., per acre	25c	Fees and expenditures per yr., per acre, about	23c
2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th yr., acre	50c	Rental, per yr., per acre	15c
Royalty, 1st 5 yrs., per ton	2c
Next 20 yrs., per ton	5c
Expenditure, 1st 5 yrs., per acre, per year	$20.00
Bond required in half amount.
Purchase	No right	Purchase, per acre	$20.00

Mr. SNELL. And those leasing areas apply equally, whether bituminous or anthracite coal?

Mr. CURRY of California. Just the same.

Mr. SNELL. And there is an abundance of anthracite coal?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes; an abundance of it. There are over 15,000,000,000 tons on the right of way of this railroad.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. From what source is the market now being supplied that they expect to supply from the Alaska coal field?

Mr. CURRY of California. It is not supplied at all except from the East, some from British Columbia, and some from Washington, low-grade coal; some through the Panama Canal and some from across the Pacific.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. There is no anthracite in the western part of the United States—in California?

Mr. CURRY of California. There is not any high-grade coal in the western section of the United States proper.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. So little it will not come in competition. So you could not tell relatively whether it would be commercially profitable or not?

Mr. CURRY of California. All the chambers of commerce on the Pacific coast want this road built and the coal mines developed.

Mr. LANKFORD. I will be glad if the gentleman would explain to the committee the importance of the reindeer industry in Alaska.

Mr. CURRY of California. While it is along this railroad right of way to a certain extent, its development does not necessarily depend on this railroad. At the present time in Alaska there are about 140,000 reindeer, and there have been 90,000 butchered for the trade. Now it is expected that on the northern plateau and along on the southwestern coast there will be millions of reindeer in time, and it will be a great source of food supply, not only for Alaska but for the United States. The food is good; it is something like beef, and it is cheap. Of course, it costs a great deal more in the United States now than beef does, but it is cheaper in Alaska, and it is a great food supply. But like the fishing industry, the reindeer industry does not depend upon the completion of this railroad.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURRY of California. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. I notice that this bill carries an appropriation of $17,000,000, which is to be immediately and continuously available until expended.

Mr. CURRY of California. It contains an authorization.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, an authorization. Now, how much is it going to cost to complete the railroad program in Alaska—the Government railroad program?

Mr. CURRY of California. Seventeen million dollars.

Mr. KNUTSON. That will complete it?

Mr. CURRY of California. Absolutely; rolling stock, terminal facilities, and everything else. This bill does not appropriate $17,000,000. It authorizes the appropriation of $17,000,000, and the Committee on Appropriations will have to act on the appropriation after we pass it, and it shall have been passed by the Senate and signed by the President.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke of the climate. Is the climate at the northern point of the railroad sufficiently warm to grow cereals there or near there, or are they grown at the southern part of the road?

Mr. CURRY of California. Of course, north of the mountains you can not grow cereal crops, but in the southern part there is a territory down there that is as large as all New England and New York and Pennsylvania combined. Alaska is one-fifth the size of the United States. Over on the northern plateau it is very cold, but they do not have very much snow there. South of the mountains, in the northern part, there is considerable snow, but down on the coast, on the southwest coast of Alaska, there is very seldom any ice and very seldom any snow. There is some but not much.

Mr. MILLER. Steamers run the year round.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. What is the altitude?

Mr. CURRY of California. The highest point reached by this railroad is 2,410 feet. That is the highest point.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. How long a time is it contemplated will be required to complete the railroad with this $17,000,000 appropriation?

Mr. CURRY of California. Until the 31st day of December, 1922.

Mr. KINKAID. With the railroad then completed, the development of Alaska will be greatly facilitated?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. And the business multiplied manyfold?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes; manyfold.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; and now the development is held back, is locked up, as it were, for the want of a decent railroad?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes; for lack of transportation among other things.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I will ask the gentleman if any of this money can be spent outside of this project.

Mr. CURRY of California. No. It can only be spent for this project.

Mr. KNUTSON. Not having been a Member of the Congress that initiated this Alaskan Railroad legislation, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any possibility of the Government in the future surrendering this railroad to private control for a nominal sum.

Mr. CURRY of California. The original bill authorizing the construction of the road provides that the Government may lease the road for a period not exceeding 20 years, or may operate the road until other provision is made by Congress. It was understood at that time that the road would be sold to private interests as soon as it was completed and the country developed a little, and it has proved to be a paying proposition. The original act provides for that very thing, but it does not vest in any bureau or department of the Government the right to sell the road. They might give it away. But it does contemplate the selling of the road, but before the road can be sold it must be satisfactory to Congress, and an act of Congress must be passed accepting and authorizing its sale.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the gentleman if any inquiries were made of the men who appeared before the committee as to what was the economy in building one end of the road and then building the other end of the road, leaving a 100-mile gap between?

Mr. CURRY of California. I have explained that.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman has explained that, he need not do it again. I will read it in the RECORD.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's explanation of this matter, and I would like to ask if he can tell me what the first appropriation was? Was it $35,000,000?

Mr. CURRY of California. Thirty-five million dollars.

Mr. RICKETTS. And this $17,000,000 added to that will complete the construction of the railroad?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will this road extend a distance of 601 miles after its completion? Will that be the total length of the road?

Mr. CURRY of California. That will be the total length of the road, including branches and spurs and sidetracks. The total length of the main line will be 471 miles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no further questions to be asked of me, I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, before that will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman from California as to the ownership of the coal area contiguous to this railroad. What proportion is owned by the Government and what proportion is owned by individuals or corporations?

Mr. CURRY of California. It is all owned by the United States Government, with the exception of a few towns and probably 400 or so farms within the right of way of the railroad, and two coal leases.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The object of this railroad was to secure a supply of coal for the Pacific seaboard, was it not?

Mr. CURRY of California. For the Pacific seaboard and for the Navy.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Does not the gentleman think that it would be better to utilize the coal of the Central West at this time and to have reserved the coal supply of Alaska for the next generation and conserve it?

Mr. CURRY of California. I do not. I have no use for that kind of conservation. The Central West has its own coal; it needs it. Let them use it.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Then the gentleman believes in exhausting the present supply of coal without regard to the future?

Mr. CURRY of California. I do not. I believe in conservation and use. There are 150,000,000,000 tons of coal in Alaska already located and estimated, and there may be more than that in Alaska. We need it on the Pacific coast, furnished at a reasonable price, so that we can conduct manufacturing enterprises and industries the same as on the eastern seaboard, so that we can utilize the finest iron ore on earth outside of Norway and equal to that of Norway. We have the best iron ore in California and on the western coast, but it is useless there for human use because we have not the coking coal, and can not get the coking coal at a reasonable price in order to develop that industry. We have been trying to develop electrical smelting systems to extract the iron from the ore, but it has only been possible in the smaller furnaces. In larger furnaces electricity will not work at all. It burns it out.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD. I note that originally $35,000,000 was appropriated, evidently with the intention of building this railroad to a certain point and furnishing a completed road. Now, I note that they are asking $17,000,000 more in order to fill up a gap between the two ends. I wish to ask what safeguards, if any, have been taken to assure us that when they get this $17,000,000 they will not use it in projects that they may consider feasible and then come back to us again for another appropriation without having delivered to us a finished railroad?

Mr. CURRY of California. In the first place, the only way that this money can be used under the provisions of this bill is on that road. The gap was left there because it was economical in time and money to build the road from both ends. At the south at Seward and at Anchorage the steamships came into the ports with the material that was needed to build the road, and it was built north. The steamships also went down the Yukon River and the Tanana River 2,000 miles and delivered material at Fairbanks, the northern terminal, and from there they built south. This gap is left between the two ends. All the money was expended under the authority and control of the President of the United States, who delegated that authority to the Secretary of the Interior, who at the suggestion of the President of the United States selected three of the best engineers in the United States to build the road. Col. Fred Mears, who constructed the United States railroad across Panama, is in charge of this railroad in Alaska. I think he has done pretty good work. This road in Alaska will cost $100,000 a mile less than any road of its kind that has been built since the beginning of the war, and I think the money has been well expended.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not doubt that, but——

Mr. CURRY of California. The gap was left there because they built from both ends for the sake of economy of time and money to get the road built as fast as possible. The war came along, wages went up 59 per cent, the cost of material went up 161 per cent, and transportation went up 147 per cent. Five thousand of the strong young men of Alaska went into the war. That is the reason that the road was not completed under the original authorization of $35,000,000. When Congress adopted the bill of the Committee on the Territories authorizing $35,000,000, if that money had been appropriated at once and put into the hands of the President, so that he could have told the Secretary of the Interior to go ahead and contract for material and supplies, the road would have been built; but we appropriated $1,000,000 the first year, and then we made appropriations of various amounts, and they could not contract for more material than each appropriation would pay for. They could not contract up to the $35,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no criticism of the Alaskan Commission, but my inquiry was directed to whether or not this money would be used for completing the road contemplated at the time the original appropriation was made.

Mr. CURRY of California. Oh, yes. It can not be used for anything else.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from California a question for information. Of course, one of the inducements for the building of this railroad was to tap the great coal fields of Alaska?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And to carry out the purpose which the gentleman has stated, of furnishing coal to California and the Pacific coast?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, practically two-thirds of this road have been constructed.

Mr. CURRY of California. Two-thirds of the road have been constructed, and that much is in operation.

Mr. McKENZIE. Have the coal fields been tapped?

Mr. CURRY of California. They have.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are the people of California now receiving coal from Alaska?

Mr. CURRY of California. They are not.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are we shipping coal into Alaska from the States?

Mr. CURRY of California. No. We were up until last year. Coal in Alaska last year was worth $35 a ton and wood $38 a cord, but this year the people of Alaska are buying coal for $6.60 a ton. But we do not get it on the Pacific coast.

Mr. McKENZIE. If these Alaskan coal fields have been tapped already, why is it that you people in California are not receiving coal from Alaska?

Mr. CURRY of California. The coal mines that are being operated in Alaska are being operated by the Alaskan Engineering Commission, one in the Matanuska field and another at Tanana. The Engineering Commission are doing practically all the mining in Alaska. There have been only two leases taken, because, as I stated before the gentleman came into the Hall this morning, the British Columbia coal-mining laws are so much more liberal than the United States coal-mining laws applying to Alaska that people will not lease the mines, and they are not going to lease coal fields up there unless after this bill passes we enact legislation that will make it an object to men to invest from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000 in coal-field development.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that there were several private railroads reaching some of these coal fields, which were bought with a portion of the original appropriation, which roads have been in existence there for a number of years?

Mr. CURRY of California. No; the Alaska Northern Railroad ran from Seward, nearly 71 miles north. It did not go anywhere near any coal fields. The Government bought the Alaska Northern Railroad for $1,157,839.49, and it has and will cost $3,518,337.72 more to put it in really first-class shape. The Alaska Northern Railroad cost its original owners $5,250,000. That was a broad-gauge line that reached from Seward north 71 miles.

The Tenana Valley Railroad, 44 miles in length, running out of Fairbanks, the Government purchased for $300,000. That railroad cost the original owners $800,000, and we not only got the road but we got the terminals and the equipment. Its rehabilitation to date has cost $46,407, and it will require a further expenditure of $84,300.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Do I understand that no private railroad in Alaska reaches the coal fields?

Mr. CURRY of California. No private railroad reaches any coal fields whatever in Alaska.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that it has never been demonstrated that the coal in Alaska is suitable for naval purposes and has never been used in any quantity by the Navy?

Mr. CURRY of California. It has not been used in any quantity, for it has not been mined. I do not know that it can be used for the Navy, but experts say that it can. It seems to me that 150,000,000,000 tons is a whole lot of coal to conserve for the Navy.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I have seen statements by experts some time ago that it was not suitable for Navy purposes. There is a difference of opinion about it.

Mr. CURRY of California. The Geological Survey and the Navy Department experts, after bringing coal to Washington and trying it out, say that it is satisfactory.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. From what source did the coal come for use on the Pacific coast prior to the time the Alaska Railroad was built?

Mr. CURRY of California. It came by ship first around the Horn and then through the Panama Canal and across the Pacific. There was some coal mined outside of Seattle which was good for fire purposes but not for engines or smelting purposes. There is no high-class coal in the United States proper this side of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 51 minutes.

Mr. CURRY of California. If there are no further questions, I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have never been a very strong advocate of Government ownership or the Government operation of railroads. When I came to Congress and was assigned to the Committee on the Territories and was told at the first meeting that one of the bills to be considered was a bill appropriating seventeen million dollars to complete a Government railroad in Alaska, I will admit that I was somewhat prejudiced against the proposition. But a study of the question, the hearing of the reports of the Department of the Interior, the evidence of engineers in charge of the railroad, and the testimony of the commission, composed of the men who built the railroad, have entirely converted me to this proposition, that this railroad ought at least to be completed.

My knowledge when I commenced attending the hearings was limited to the fact that I knew Alaska was a great country that cost us $7,200,000 and produced largely in both fisheries and gold. That was about all I knew of it; and while I knew that it was a large country, I was surprised when told that it was one-fifth as large as the United States. I found this comparison as to its size, and I would like to put it in the RECORD. It shows Alaska could have placed within its borders the thirteen original States that composed this Union and in addition have Maine, Vermont, Ohio, Indiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Michigan also placed within its boundaries. It is a great empire.

I have been somewhat astonished to learn that it is also a great treasure storehouse, filled with resources that will make a prosperous and rich territory. There has been discovered in Alaska not only gold but silver, copper, coal, lead, iron, antimony, tungsten, and platinum in large quantities. In addition, there has been discovered large fields of oil.

Another thing that surprised me was the fact that it has splendid agricultural advantages. It is estimated that it has over 100,000 square miles of tillable land. It has a growing season of 100 days, and because of the great length of the days, that growing season is worth about 200 of our days. So that they are enabled to grow crops suitable to take care of a large population and take care of the stock that they may produce.

Mr. BOX. What are those crops?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Wheat, oats, rye, barley, hay, and they have produced an alfalfa which makes a good crop.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman just stated that the Territory of Alaska had 100,000 acres of tillable land. Does not the gentleman think that is rather a low estimate?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I intended to say 100,000 square miles; it has over 100,000 acres along the line of this railroad.

Mr. MAYS. The total territory of tillable land is very much larger?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Oh, yes; 100,000 square miles of rich farming land. The study of Alaska has changed my position on another proposition. I used to believe in the conservation of all natural resources. I have learned that so far as Alaska is concerned it has been an absolute failure. Conservation in Alaska has been reservation, and reservation has killed its development. The building of this railway was made necessary in 1914 because of the fact that the development of the great natural resources of Alaska had absolutely ceased, caused by the Government reservation of all mineral and timber lands.

Alaska is not only rich in minerals of all kinds and has rich farming lands in its beautiful valleys but its vast forests of timber suitable for paper pulp are awaiting a ready market, while its fisheries are the greatest on this Continent. This railroad commences at the town of Seward on the south coast, which is never icebound and runs north through the Natanuska River valley, through the Susitna River valley, over the range at Broad Pass through the Nenana River valley, crosses the great Tanana River, and has its main northern terminal at the town of Fairbanks, thus connecting the great navigable waterways of central and northern Alaska and its great gold fields around Fairbanks with the southern coast, making it possible, by tapping the great mineral heart of this treasure chest of nature, to open and develop the same for the American people, which until this railroad is completed and until the laws permit individual and industrial development must remain closed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that the statistics show the imports and exports of Alaska have increased all of the time from year to year on up to the present time?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is true, because we have brought out great amounts of gold and have increased our fisheries, but the development of the other resources of Alaska has not increased, and this railroad was built, and is being built, for the purpose of developing those resources. Prior to 1914 two railroads had been started by private enterprise in the territory now covered by this railway the Government is now building; one at the north end of this road, called the Tanana Valley Railroad, upon which had been expended $800,000, and the other, the Alaskan Northern Railroad, upon which had been expended in excess of $5,300,000, but when the Government restricted the development of the resources of Alaska these railroad properties waned. There was no use of building railroads in a country where the Government had prohibited the development of its resources and locked up its forests and mineral wealth, and when the Government finally decided to build its own railroad and develop those resources, which it did by the appropriation of $35,000,000 in 1914, it was enabled to purchase these two railroads for a small consideration; purchasing the Tanana Valley Railroad, upon which had been expended $800,000, for $300,000, and purchasing the Alaskan Northern Railroad, on which had been expended $5,300,000, for $1,100,000, but the completion of this railroad will not of itself release the locked-up storehouse of this great natural wealth, and it becomes very evident that if we are to have the benefit of the Alaskan resources we must change our plans regarding the reservation of all forest and mineral wealth in that great, rich Territory, and I was glad that the chairman said that he would soon introduce bills to make it possible for our people to go in there and develop those great resources.

This railroad that the Government has so far built, I am glad also to say to you, has been built, I think, practically free from politics and has been built free from graft. The report of the engineers gives an account of every mile of railroad, the cost of each mile, the construction of the bridges, tunnels, terminals, equipment, and so forth, and they showed to us that, in spite of adverse conditions, in spite of the fact that 5,000 of young men out of a population of 50,000 had been taken out of Alaska and sent to war, in spite of the fact that labor conditions, because of the taking of these 5,000 men, had been handicapped, and in spite of the increase in the cost of labor and of all building materials they will still complete this road at a cost of about $100,000 a mile and purchase the equipment. If you will compare that with the cost of railroads in this country built recently or that have been constructed in mountainous districts, you will find that that is a very good report, and I think it shows that the men in charge of this railroad are to be complimented upon what they have accomplished.

This railroad starts at Seward, at the south coast of Alaska, and runs right up into the heart of the Territory and taps the Tanana River Valley, which river flows into the Yukon River. The Tanana River and the Yukon, with their tributaries, furnish navigable streams, affording an opportunity to reach the entire central part of Alaska.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. To what extent and how far up from the Yukon is the Tanana River navigable?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Tanana River is crossed by this railroad about 100 miles from the point where it enters the Yukon River, and from such point to the east it is navigable for about 400 miles. It is estimated that there are navigable streams of about 5,000 miles in Alaska, running from the western coast through its central portion to almost its eastern boundary; and this railroad would make it possible to tap all of that great system of waterways.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Could this railroad be used at all seasons of the year when it is constructed?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This railroad will be used at all seasons of the year. Of course, the waterways—the Yukon and the Tanana River—can not be used at all seasons, for they are frozen over in the wintertime, but the railroad can be operated the entire season of the year.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman speaks of this railroad being operated at all seasons of the year after it is completed. Will it be operated at a financial loss to the United States Government or will it be able to pay its own operating expenses?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The engineers have assured us that when this railroad is connected clear through, so that the waterways in the heart of Alaska and the gold fields around Fairbanks, at the northern terminus, can be connected up with the southern coast and the regions through which the railroad passes developed, it will be a profitable road.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that the engineers assured us in the hearings before the committee that the snowfall beginning at Seward does not exceed over 6 inches to 12 and at no point on the road, from the beginning at Seward to the northern part, does it exceed 6 feet?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is true.

The proposition of the development of the coal fields has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and it seems to me that the fact that with these two branches of the road in operation—the branch around Fairbanks reaching the great Tanana coal fields of six beds, each over 20 feet thick, and that around Anchorage and Seward, extending out to Matanuska and reaching the proven high-grade coal of the Matanuska field—it is conclusively shown that they will eventually produce enough coal at reasonable prices to not only take care of Alaska and take care of our fleet, but to take care of the needs of our northwestern territory. Coal is laid down at Anchorage now and along the completed lines of this railroad at a cost of $6.60 a ton.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman states that coal costs $6.60 a ton. It has also been stated that the coal mines of Alaska are both anthracite and bituminous. Is there any difference in the price between anthracite and bituminous coal; and if so, what is the amount?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. There is no difference in the price. The cost is in the mining and delivery at the market. The gentleman understands that at the present time there are no coal mines operated in Alaska except by the Government, because of the reservation of the coal lands, a lease only being allowed to those who will bond themselves to expend $20 per acre, while in British Columbia the cost is but 23 cents per acre.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. I was prompted to ask that question for the reason that in the United States, if I am correctly informed, anthracite coal costs three times the amount of bituminous coal, and I was wondering why, if that was true in the United States, it would not also be true in Alaska.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Of course, my knowledge of the coal business is limited, but I understand that the great difference in the cost of coal in this country is the cost of carriage—the freight cost.

Mr. CURRY of California. The only coal that is used in Alaska is used by the railroad, and, of course, for fuel purposes. There are no manufacturing industries up there that use coal.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Along the line of this railroad, in the valleys through which it runs, already over 400 farmers have made good homes and have good farms, but you understand that there is yet 100 miles of the railroad uncompleted, and on which but little has been started. Construction was carried on at the northern end because of the Tanana Valley Railroad already under construction there, and because by the use of the waterways material could be gotten by the water route to that point; construction was also carried on at the southern end because of the 71 miles of the Alaska Northern Railroad already completed there and the opportunity to deliver material on the south coast, but between these two almost completed parts of the road there is 100 miles across "Broad-pass" on which no work has been done, or very little. When this 100 miles has been filled in and the entire road connected up and completed the farmers who have located along these valleys will be enabled to ship out their products, and other farms will be opened up, and then if the restrictions against development are taken off, or at least made more liberal, our people will go into Alaska and settle the country like they have been going in Canada, and they will find it a far better country.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman mean to tell us that there are 400 farmers located in these valleys that have farms practically developed already?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman mean that they have erected houses, barns, and necessary buildings to reside thereon?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICKETTS. That they are cultivating the soil and producing crops?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, sir; and if the gentleman will take the trouble to look at the pictures of these farms out in the lobby he will be surprised at the development that they have made there.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. What country of Europe would be comparable as to general conditions of agriculture and habitation with Alaska?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Why, Norway and Sweden. One thing in particular in the hearings was somewhat surprising; and that is that the southern coast of Alaska has the same climate as Kansas and the city of Washington, except as to extremes of temperature. The extremes of temperature are not so great. It is not so cold in the winter time nor so warm in the summer time. The central part of Alaska has the same temperature or climate as northern Minnesota and the Dakotas, except that the extremes of temperature are greater.

Mr. ELSTON. Then Alaska is not an inhospitable place, like Greenland, or anything of that kind, is it?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The report of the engineers who have been in Alaska building this road is to the effect that it is a country to which a great many of our people will preferably go when they know the resources of Alaska.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman has stated that the cost per mile for the completion of this railroad was in the neighborhood of $100,000?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. RHODES. I should like to know if the cost per mile for the construction of the road that has been built up to this time has been more or less than that amount?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, it is hard to answer that question because some miles have been built over mountains and through tunnels and over bridges, and therefore some of the miles have cost an immense amount of money; but the mileage that has been constructed averages a good deal less than $100,000 a mile, but with this appropriation of $17,000,000 added to the original appropriation of $35,000,000, and making a total of $52,000,000, the entire road, with harbors, terminals, snowsheds, bridges, and all equipment will not exceed over $100,000 per mile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. I would like that the gentleman have a little more time in order to ask another question.

Mr. CURRY of California. I will yield the gentleman time enough to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. RHODES. Two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. RHODES. The further question, Mr. Chairman, I assume that the topography of this Alaskan country is very much like that through which the Great Northern and other roads, the Washington & Oregon, pass?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. RHODES. Is the gentleman informed as to whether or not the cost of construction per mile for the completing of the Alaskan Railroad is more or less than that of railroads in the United States through similar territory?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It has been less.

Mr. RHODES. And this further question: If this country abounds in these wonderful resources such as the gentleman has indicated, and which I do not dispute, why did it become necessary in the first instance and why is it now necessary for the Government of the United States to build and maintain and operate this railroad?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am glad the gentleman asked that question; I thought I had made it plain. The Government in establishing the reservations of the resources of Alaska has reserved all these great resources from public entry, and for that reason the development of Alaska absolutely stopped. Hence the Government had to build its own railroad, for no one would build a railroad in a territory in which the Government had absolutely taken all the resources of the country out of the market. I have explained that the two railroads that had been started by private enterprise were compelled to quit and sell out to the Government.

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman undertake to state that the progress of this country depended upon the consuming or using up of these resources in Alaska to the extent that it became necessary to go into the railroad enterprise?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I know they have not even scratched the surface of Alaska in the finding of this great amount of mineral wealth. The Government, as soon as these things were discovered, took them off the market. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TEMPLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920.

CONSTRUCTION OF ALASKAN RAILROAD.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. GRIGSBY].

Mr. GRIGSBY. Mr. Chairman, the most important feature of this bill in my estimation is that clause which provides that the $17,000,000 appropriation shall be immediately and continuously available when appropriated. It is the lack of such a provision in the act authorizing the original appropriation of $35,000,000 which, to a large extent, has created the necessity for this appropriation. The railroad commission has been compelled to come down here or be represented here year after year to lobby for driblets of this original authorization in order to go on with their work.

Now, they are working up there in a country that is 5,000 miles away——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. I think the gentleman is hardly correct that they have had to lobby for driblets. I think the hearings show that they were appropriated all that was asked for the building of this road.

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that correct?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Before I leave that subject I will show that that is not correct; that is not the case. The amount of the appropriations has been uncertain, and they have been delayed in getting them. Now, in that connection——

Mr. DOWELL. Is there anything in the hearings to show that there has been any delay in getting appropriations from Congress to build this road?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. I would like to have the reference.

Mr. GRIGSBY. I would like to read into the RECORD an extract from the testimony of Col. Mears, given before the Committee on the Territories in the hearings on this bill on the exact question which the gentleman asked. Mr. Mears testified as follows:

Now, it has been said that appropriations have been made steadily as the work progressed.

As the engineer in charge of the most important district on the Government railroad, I was in Alaska continuously, summer and winter, from April, 1915, to January, 1918, excepting two months which I spent visiting Washington in 1917 for conference with Chairman Edes and Secretary Lane.

I was frequently handicapped in the management of affairs for lack of necessary funds—not the "actual lack" of money so much as the utter lack of definite knowledge that the money asked for would be appropriated.

A few extracts from official reports will more clearly illustrate my remarks.

In the fall of 1915 we were practically out of funds, and in a letter I wrote to Secretary Lane, under date of December 4, 1915, which letter appears in print in the public document issued by the Sixty-fourth Congress covering the hearings on the deficiency appropriations for 1916, I urged the appropriation of an emergency fund of $2,000,000 to continue progressive construction work, and I also called attention at that time to the necessity for making a large initial appropriation for this project.

As a matter of information, I desire to read to your committee certain pertinent paragraphs which appeared in the letter referred to.

I want to read the letter, because it answers the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL]. It is as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I received your wire of December 1 yesterday in regard to delaying the appropriation for this work until July 1, 1916, and I replied to same immediately per copy of telegram attached.

"I feel that this matter is of sufficient importance to ask for your personal consideration of the following remarks, which I will make as brief as possible. In fact, I deem it my duty to acquaint you with the situation just as it is and give you the benefit of certain recommendations.

"My principal concern is in the wording of your message,' which conveys the meaning that possibly no further appropriations will be made for this work until July 1, 1916.

Now, they have exhausted the appropriation for 1915. Winter is about to set in, and the Secretary has informed him that in all probability there will be no further appropriation until the following July, and he is up there with his organized force ready to go ahead with what work can be done in the winter, and to make plans for the following summer's work, which must commence at the opening of the summer season, which is in May, and this appropriation is not coming up until July. That is what he is protesting about. Now, he says:

"Such a result would be most unfortunate, if not disastrous, to this project. If you could be here on the ground, Mr. Secretary, could see the men available for this winter work, the supplies, the outfit, and the beautiful weather that we are having, you would ask yourself these questions: Why isn't this work going ahead? Why is not the clearing of the right of way along Turnagain Arm and along the Matanuska Branch line being done now? There are 100 miles of right-of-way clearing that I could start to-morrow if the money was available. The wood cutters could work better now than in August, with no mosquitoes or flies, with no forest fires to endanger surrounding timber. All of the right-of-way clearing could be done economically this winter, as contracts could be let for a low figure at this time. Such work should start at once. It serves no useful purpose to postpone this work; on the contrary, it would be a decided advantage to have the timber out of the way by spring to avoid delaying the grading.

"If it is the intention of Congress and the administration to build this railroad, a large portion of our estimate for said purpose should be appropriated immediately, particularly if any degree of economy or efficiency is expected. We can not carry on this work successfully, Mr. Secretary, with such meager appropriations. It would be better to abandon the entire project until the necessary funds are forthcoming. I haven't any particular desire to go to the penitentiary for statutory embezzlement in overrunning our appropriation, neither have I any desire to sit down on the job with my hands folded for seven months of the year. There is no good reason why the work should not go ahead actively. There will probably never be a better time to secure good labor so easily. There are 400 or 500 station laborers in and near Anchorage now, all entirely idle, to say nothing of other men more widely scattered all over this section.

"In writing the above report I have felt that you are entitled to a full expression of my opinion regarding the conduct of this work, particularly in view of the possible misconception of the situation on the ground.

"There is not the slightest doubt of the projects requiring an ample appropriation of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000, and I have taken this means to add my recommendation that such an amount be made available.

"Cordially, yours,

"F. MEARS, Commissioner."

Congress appropriated $2,000,000 in the urgency deficiency bill which became available on March 1, 1916, for the purpose of continuing the work until the regular appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, should be made available.

Hearings before the House Appropriations Committee on this item of $8,247,620 were held on March 14, 1916, and at that time the committee was asked to appropriate the full amount of $8,247,620 to prosecute the work between July 1, 1916, and June 30, 1917.

This the Appropriation Committee failed to do. They deducted the $2,000,000 previously appropriated from the total amount of the annual appropriation and made only $6,247,620 available to carry on the work for the entire fiscal year.

Chairman Edes's request to have the entire amount made available is contained in his testimony before the committee on March 14, 1916, which appears on page 734 of the hearings on the sundry civil bill, and Chairman Edes further urged the Appropriation Committee to pass this entire amount by a letter which he directed to Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, under date of March 16, 1916, and which letter appears in full on page 746 of the same volume.

Furthermore, the main appropriation, as reduced, was badly delayed and did not become available on July 1 as customary. Large items that the commission had planned to pay out of it had to be met by payment from the small deficiency appropriation, and this at a time when we had continuous daylight in Alaska for prosecuting the work. In a letter which Chairman Edes addressed to me from Washington, under date of May 5, 1916, he said:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1916.

"MY DEAR MEARS: I am in receipt of a letter from the Secretary cautioning me to make provision for the payment of $650,000 as final payment on the Alaskan Northern due July 5, next. If this payment is not made on time we forfeit the $500,000 already paid. Congress seems to be in something of a deadlock over the order of business and the appropriation bills are being delayed. It is possible, in fact quite probable, that we may have to make this payment from our two million emergency appropriation. It is imperative that we make provision for it. I hope we will not have to delay the work to any great extent, but we must provide for this payment."

Again, in the following year—in February, 1917—we were without reliable information about the availability of funds. An item of $3,000,000 in the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year 1918 had passed the House, as had the main appropriation, and due to a deadlock the sundry civil bill failed of passage in the Senate. As it was the short session of Congress, most energetic measures had to be taken to get a joint resolution put through, to make this $3,000,000 available.

It was only secured at 11 p. m. March 3. Meanwhile we, on the job in Alaska, were undecided as to how to proceed with our plans until the money was actually available.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill seems to meet the gentleman's objection because it authorizes the appropriation to be made continuously. The question I would like to ask the gentleman, and with which I am sure others are concerned, is this: The chairman of the committee stated that there was coal in Alaska, now already located, to the extent of 150,000,000 tons. I have heard that there had been a lobby here in behalf of the Coal Trust interests to get that coal out of the hands of the Government and into the hands of the interests of the coal combine; that proper steps are to be taken to prevent this coal going into the hands of such monopolies, otherwise it will not be beneficial to the people of the United States in that it will not be developed, but held back in reserve. Can the gentleman enlighten us on that subject?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will state to the gentleman that at the present time there is no danger of that coal in Alaska getting into the hands of anybody. It has all been withdrawn from entry and can be developed only under the leasing law.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I was about to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas with regard to the coal by stating that the coal is all tied up now. We have a leasing law, under which no one will operate, and there is no coal being mined to any extent except by the Government. There never will be any coal mined to any extent in Alaska, except by the Government, until the terms of the leasing law are made more liberal. No one will mine coal up there unless he be given a chance to make some money; and the leasing laws should be changed or else the coal should be thrown open; I believe that it is better for the coal lands to be thrown open, under such legislation as Congress may enact, to prevent monopoly by the Guggenheims or others, than to have it stay locked up there for the next 100 years, and compel the people of Alaska to pay freight on coal from elsewhere, and the Government of the United States to pay for the transportation of coal from the Atlantic to the Pacific for the use of the Navy.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I was making is, if the gentleman will permit me, if the coal could be mined and sold there for a reasonable profit at $4 or $5 a ton, yet if we permit the monopolists to get hold of it and they were to hold it back for eight or nine or ten or twelve dollars a ton, how would it benefit the people of the United States?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I agree with the gentleman that the people of the United States can not be benefited by any system which holds the coal in the ground. We must pass some legislation which will get it out. But at the present time there is no law by which anybody can get it out, except the Government. So under the present existing laws there is no danger of any monopoly such as the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will.

Mr. SHREVE. As a Member of the Sixty-third Congress I supported the original appropriation of $35,000,000. I believed then it was a good purpose, and I believe it now. I would like to ask the gentleman if the $35,000,000 have already been exhausted? Recently we made another appropriation of $2,000,000, and that makes $37,000,000——

Mr. GRIGSBY. That makes the $35,000,000.

Mr. SHREVE. Have the original $35,000,000 been exhausted?

Mr. GRIGSBY. No, sir. The original appropriation of $35,000,000 will be exhausted probably by the middle of next month, with a probable balance of sufficient for operating and other expenses until the first of next year.

Mr. SHREVE. Then there is not a lack of appropriation on the part of Congress, but more of authorization for the purpose of using the money that delayed matters in Alaska, is it not?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will answer that in this way: Most of the work up there is done in the summer season. The plans must be made in the winter before. Your system of appropriations is according to the fiscal year, which ends on June 30. The road has been built on a rising market, so that even when the amount asked for has been appropriated, based on estimates for the following year, the rise in prices has prevented it from being enough. Consequently there was a deficiency before the end of the next year. Then in one or two instances the amount appropriated was not as large as the amount estimated. The estimate was cut down.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. This road is in process of completion?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Construction is being carried on there now?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. How much of a force is being employed in the completion of the work of construction?

Mr. GRIGSBY. At the present time I understand about 2,400 men are employed.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman know what the per diem wage is of these men?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I think common labor receives between 50 and 60 cents an hour.

Mr. RICKETTS. Do you think you will have any trouble in getting labor there to finish this work?

Mr. GRIGSBY. They will not have. There has been a scarcity of labor of all kinds, both in the mines and in all other industries, due to the war.

Mr. RICKETTS. One other question. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] asked whether there was actually a vast amount of coal in Alaska. What do you say about that?

Mr. GRISBY. I will say this, that the reports of Geologist Brooks, the expert of this bureau who has examined the coal in Alaska, show etimates of about 12,000 square miles of coal fields, and of this amount about 1,200 square miles are considered to be underlaid with coal, as far as can be judged without actual measurements. The amount of coal in Alaska is estimated at 150,000,000,000 tons.

Mr. RICKETTS. Has there been prospecting there to determine the depth of the coal?

Mr. GRIGSBY. No. There has not been except at the Government's mines.

Mr. RICKETTS. The Government has a mine there now?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Can the gentleman tell us what the thickness of the vein is?

Mr. GRIGSBY. From 3 to 40 feet in the Nenana fields. The aggregate thickness there is 231 feet. In the Eska and Chickaloon mines it varies from 3 to 20 feet. It is estimated that the fields south of Nenana contain 9,000,000,000 tons of coal. Now, as to what they actually know, they have blocked out in the Eska and Chickaloon mines about 800,000 tons at the present time. These two Government mines produced about 80,000 tons last year. They are just being developed. They sent a naval commission up there this last spring to examine both the coal mines with a view to doing some work for the Navy, and to examine the harbors with a view of establishing coaling stations under an appropriation that was passed in 1918, which appropriated $44,000,000 for fuel and transportation. That act provided that $1,000,000 of that amount could be used by the Secretary to develop Alaskan coal. Your deficiency bill last February covered all that money into the Treasury. You passed a naval appropriation bill on July 11 which attempted to reappropriate that $1,000,000 for Alaska. I went down to the department the other day to find out why nothing was being done with it, and they said they did not have any money. They said you had inadvertently attempted to appropriate something from a special fund that had been covered into the Treasury, and they could not go ahead.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the Government drive entries in the surface or is the coal mined by shafts?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I think it is done both ways, but I have never visited the coal mines.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman speaks of the restricted policy, with reference to the development of the coal fields especially. When was that policy established, and what was the purpose, and what has been the purpose behind it?

Mr. GRIGSBY. The coal lands were withdrawn from entry in 1906 on account of the fear of monopoly. There was a charge that a certain syndicate was attempting to secure title to some of the principal coal fields in Alaska through the use of dummy locators. Those were the Cunningham coal fraud cases, out of which prosecutions arose, and the President at that time, in order to save the situation, withdrew from entry all the coal lands in Alaska; not only those in controversy, but all the coal lands; and that withdrawal is still in effect. A leasing bill was passed, which has not been a success.

Mr. RICKETTS. What President, may I ask, was it that withdrew that?

Mr. GRIGSBY. President Roosevelt. And in 1910 the oil was all withdrawn from entry.

The question was asked a while ago about the population of Alaska. We have no population beyond the number stated, because the resources of the country have been locked up, so that the people who have lived there have lived there by skimming the cream of the country. The coal is all locked up; the oil is locked up; the best timber is all in forest reserves. Everything is reserved.

In that connection I got a telegram here the other day from a deputy marshal at Dutch Harbor, on the island of Unalaska, away down in the Aleutian Islands, wanting me to use my influence with the Department of Agriculture to get a permit for four men to prospect on the island of Unalaska. Now, just think of it! I used my influence with the department, but was unable to get the permit.

Three of these men served in the last war, and they are trying to get a permit to prospect for the mineral wealth of the islands in the Aleutian chain, but they can not get it, because it is a bird reserve, and in a letter which I have here the department says it is unwilling to have those men go on those islands with ammunition or guns for fear they might kill some of the wild life. The wild life of Alaska is protected, and the resources of the country are locked up. Even the brown bear is protected in order to afford big-game hunting for eastern sportsmen. The brown bear is most destructive of cattle and sheep, and frequently attacks the prospector, who has no rights that the bear is bound to respect. I know of a case where a settler had a band of 30 sheep which were attacked by a distemper during the winter; he carefully nursd them and brought them all through, but in the spring a brown bear got among them and destroyed all of them but one. If this settler had killed the bear before it attacked the sheep he would have been prosecuted. This is not an extreme case, but is fairly illustrative of the effect of the conservation laws in Alaska. No wonder the population is stationary.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Had not Congress better devote its energies to the opening up of the country before it builds the railroad?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I think you had better complete the railroad, and then open up the country and throw it open to men who want to go there.

Mr. GARNER. If we build the railroad up there and do not open up the resources of the country, what is going to support the railroad?

Mr. GRIGSBY. The resources of the country which support this railroad are in the interior, in the country tributary to the road from Seward to Anchorage, and from Anchorage to Fairbanks, and consist of vast fields, thousands of acres of low-grade placer and quartz mining, and this mining is not reserved. It is about the only thing in Alaska that has not been reserved. It can not be developed at present because, as I said before, the miners have skimmed the cream of the country. They have taken out what could be mined at a profit with the present high rates of transportation. They have taken out of the Fairbanks country $75,000,000, and it is estimated that half of that was paid out in transportation.

It is estimated carefully by experts that the average freight rate per ton on every ton of goods landed at the head of navigation in Fairbanks on in the vicinity of Fairbanks costs $100. It costs more than that to get it to the point where it is going to be used. It is only bonanza mining that will stand that kind of freight rate, and the bonanza mining has been done. Yet the experts tell us that for every dollar taken out there are $10 left in the ground which could be mined in any country under ordinary conditions of freight transportation and cost of supplies. The reason why this railroad ought to be completed at once is in order to open up that country. That is one of the reasons. But after you get it built and get that country opened up, and after you accomplish every purpose that this railroad can accomplish, you have got to do away with some of these conservation laws.

The country tributary to this line of road, including the Fairbanks district, the Kenai Peninsula and Turnagain Arm district, the Willow Creek, Yentna, Kantishna, Valdez Creek, and Bonnifield districts, has produced $111,000,000, but, as I said before, with the prevailing rates of transportation, only the high-grade properties could be worked.

The completion of this road will cause a wonderful revival of mining in all these districts and will afford numerous bases of supplies for the prospector, and consequently new discoveries will be made and immense new areas of mineral land will be prospected and developed. The tributary country will be connected with the railroad by wagon roads where water transportation is not available. The Territory of Alaska is now spending $200,000 a year for the building of wagon roads; the Government owns 98 per cent of Alaska, but is not spending much more. The Territory does not own the other 2 per cent, but only a small portion thereof.

The development of the mining industry consequent upon the completion of the road will increase the population and afford a local market for agricultural products, thus insuring a permanent as well as an increasing population. Alaska contains 500,000 square miles of territory; 156,000 square miles of this is timberland, and 40,000 square miles of this timber is fit for manufacturing purposes. There are in the Territory 100,000 square miles of good agricultural land.

It has been demonstrated by actual test that wheat, barley, oats and rye, potatoes, and all other grains and vegetables raised in the northern States can be successfully raised in Alaska. Last year 30 tons of good wheat was harvested in the Tanana Valley, and the first flour mill was installed. The valleys tributary to the railroad will support millions of cattle. Finland is in the same latitude as Alaska, and has the same climatic conditions. It annually exports $9,000,000 in live animals, meat, game, and butter products; nearly $50,000,000 in wood pulp, paper, and wood manufactures. It produces 50,000,000 bushels of grain annually. Finland supports a population of over 3,000,000 people; it has over 2,000 miles of Government-owned and operated railroad. Alaska has far more arable land, grazing land, and timber, and will eventually support several times the population of Finland; but for the present the development of agricultural Alaska depends upon the local market which will be furnished by the mining stimulus attendant upon the completion of this road.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he stated that he would rather have the resources of Alaska thrown open and developed by the Guggenheims than not have them developed at all. May I ask the gentleman what is the objection to the methods of development as to coal by the Guggenheims, and in what way is their exploiting of the resources of Alaska objectionable? And will he also state what opportunities are offered to the individual citizen who may go into Alaska to develop that country or to aid in its development?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will say to the gentleman that I expected to lend my efforts to the securing of the passage of this bill without the assistance of the Guggenheims. That is, I did not expect by some attack upon them or their methods to prejudice you against them and thereby secure your favor for this bill. I understand that element entered into the argument to a large extent at the time the original bill was passed.

Now, from what I have read on the subject, as the situation was at that time, the Guggenheims not only controlled the transportation by the steam vessels operating between Seattle and Alaska, but they also controlled the transportation of the Yukon River and had certain agreements with the White Pass Railroad going around by way of Skagway and down the river. At least that was charged. They were in control of all the steamship transportation direct to Alaska except one line, which has always maintained the same rates. They owned the Copper River Railroad and had control of freight rates over that road as far as it extended into the interior. There was a proposition at that time to extend the railroad into Fairbanks instead of the present route. Now, as to what they have done since in developing their property which they own I have no objection to it. Their operations in Alaska are confined to developing their copper and other properties and to operating the steamships. The question of ocean freight rates is a problem that will have to be solved by whatever commission Congress vests with jurisdiction. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is now conducting hearings on a bill which provides for extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to all water transportation. Alaska is dependent wholly upon water transportation for commerce with the outside. There is no rail competition. There is no reason for excepting Alaska from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has stated that the Guggenheims had control of the fixing of the freight rates in Alaska. If they had control of that, they had it through the Secretary of the Interior, because the law imposes upon the Secretary of the Interior the duty of fixing all freight rates in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. GRIGSBY. I think the situation now is that the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been extended to railroad rates in Alaska; but I believe the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] which I am about to answer was what objection I had to the methods of the Guggenheims. Now, I do not want to drag that subject into this discussion, because I do not think it has anything to do with it, and I do not know much about their methods, aside from their operating their steamship line and their operating the copper mine out of which they have exported millions of dollars worth of copper. They made a net profit on one group of mines of $21,000,000 in the year 1916. Their railroad cost them from $16,000,000 to $21,000,000. It cost $83,000 a mile to construct it in 1908–9, at a time when materials and supplies were half the price that they were when this Government railroad was constructed, which shows that the construction of this railroad has been comparatively cheap. But I do not think that anything the Guggenheims are doing now has anything to do with this project at this time. The situation before you is this: You have authorized the expenditure of $35,000,000 to build this project. All of this amount has been expended, or will be before the close of the present year. It was estimated at the outset that it would be enough and that the road would be built in five years. On account of the rise in prices it has not been enough, and on account of the delay, both owing to the lack of labor and to delay in appropriations, there has not been enough time.

The road is two-thirds completed and it will never be any good except locally for the purposes for which it was originally built until it is finished. So this is a plain business proposition, to finish the road or turn the country back to the Indians.

The interior country will never be developed without transportation, and just as sure as we have transportation it will develop, as every other country has developed, when you give it transportation.

I have been over the most of the country. This subject was thoroughly discussed in 1914 when the original bill was brought before the House, and you gentlemen here who were then present know that every fact concerning Alaska which could possibly be produced before you, every fact concerning her resources, was produced at that time and is now of record and accessible in public documents, reports of committee hearings, and geological reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GRIGSBY. The chairman of the Committee on the Territories [Mr. CURRY of California] has stated that at the time of the purchase of Alaska from Russia certain pessimistically inclined persons denominated Alaska as "Seward's iceberg." There are still pessimists who have the same view and who claim that Russia handed us a lemon. No pessimist ever built a railroad or developed a new country—we have to depend upon optimists for projects of that kind. Up in Alaska we have a new definition of an optimist—an optimist is a man who can make lemonade out of a "lemon"; in other words, an optimist is a man who believes in the development of the latent attributes and resources of whatever is offered to him. He believes if he puts seeds in the ground they will grow and yield a crop; he believes if he sinks a shaft he will find pay on bedrock; he believes if it is not in the first hole it is more apt to be in the second; he believes his labors will bear fruit wherever they are intelligently directed, and experience teaches him that this is true; and he believes if he builds railroads they will develop the country through which they traverse and will get tonnage. If this country had not that kind of optimists we would not to-day have our great West; and what has been the history of the growth of the great West will be the history of Alaska as sure as you apply the same methods of development to that great Territory.

Since 1867 Alaska has exported $847,000,000 worth of products; two-fifths of this amount, or $335,000,000 worth, was produced in the last five years, and one-fifth of this amount, or $184,000,000 worth, was produced in the last two years; and this despite the fact that the war took from our population 5,000 or 6,000 of our most vigorous men for the Army and Navy and work directly connected with the prosecution of the war, and despite the fact that, owing to the enormous increase in the prices of mining machinery and supplies and scarcity of labor, gold mining was largely curtailed and prospecting practically ceased. Notwithstanding all this, Alaska has gone over the top in every Liberty loan and Red Cross drive. Not only have we gone over the top, but in the third Libery loan we were second in the United States; and in the fourth, the largest Liberty loan, although our quota was doubled over that of the third Liberty loan, we headed all of the States, subscribing 232.2 per cent of our quota. The nearest approach to that by any other State was 185 per cent.

The number of subscribers to this loan in Alaska was 12,080, more by 3,000 than the total vote cast in the election in the fall of 1918 in that Territory. That is the kind of a constituency I have the honor to represent, and they are up there, now, waiting for you to unlock the resources of the Territory and throw it open to development; they are waiting along the line of this railroad in towns which the Government organized, and in which it sold lots to them and encouraged them to build on, and where they have been encouraged to go into business on the governmental assurance of the completion of the railroad and settlement of the country. They are hanging onto their mining claims in the districts tributary to the railroad, waiting for cheaper transportation, so that they can open them up at a profit. The Government has tied up Alaska in the name of conservation and to prevent monopoly; it has prevented the development of the country through private capital by tying up its resources; it has promised Government aid in unlocking the resources of the country, and it is up to the Government to make good that promise by the speedy passage of this bill and other appropriate legislation.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIGSBY. I will.

Mr. RHODES. I assume that we are all agreed that the success and prosperity of every country depends in a large measure on the railroad transportation. I am anxious to know why it is private enterprise can not construct and operate railroads in Alaska just as they have constructed and operated railroads elsewhere in the country.

Mr. GRIGSBY. The only answer I can give is that private enterprise which constructs railroads into a new country always does it as an extension of some system already paying. We have no connection between the United States and Alaska by rail. Private enterprise will not initiate a railroad project in a country where there is no line operating at a profit, except to exploit private interests. Private enterprise can not afford to construct railroads in a country which is tied up, whose resources are being held back. When the Northern Pacific and Great Northern Railroads were built, instead of tying up the resources of the country the Government donated them to the railroads. Now we have the opposite condition. We not only do not offer to donate anything but we tie them up so that nobody can get them.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman spoke a while ago of the original object, the primary conception at the time the railroad project was first brought into existence. What was that primary purpose for which this railroad was undertaken on the part of the Government?

Mr. GRIGSBY. The primary purpose, as indicated in the message of President Wilson, his first message after he was inaugurated, was to connect the ocean ports of the Pacific and the southern coast of Alaska with the Yukon River and its tributaries so as to provide a short, swift, and direct connection with the great interior of that country.

The second purpose was to connect the seaports with the coal fields in order to insure a supply of coal on the Pacific coast both for commercial purposes and the use of the Navy.

Before I finish I want to mention the secondary purpose. You have a large part of the Navy to-day on the Pacific coast. In 1914, when this original bill was passed, you had a small Navy on the Pacific coast. At that time they consumed about 150,000 tons of coal annually. I have endeavored to find out how much coal it takes to furnish the Navy now, but have not been able to get the data, but I presume it is from 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons a year. Where is the coal? It is not on the Pacific coast. They have no Navy coal on the Pacific coast except in Alaska. So it must be brought around from Chesapeake Bay or from elsewhere in the East, and it is being brought around that way at a cost ranging from $12 to $15 a ton after it is bought and the freight paid.

One of the purposes of this bill was to connect the Alaskan coal fields with the southern harbors of Alaska to insure a plentiful supply of good and cheap coal for naval purposes. Your appropriation bill, which I mentioned a few moments ago, was passed in order to aid the development of that project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has again expired.

Mr. WATKINS. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. GRIGSBY. Every reason which existed for the Government going into the railroad business in Alaska in 1914 is a great deal better reason to-day. We know more about the resources of the country; we know more about its agricultural resources. The coal has been tested and developed and we know more about it, and the transportation question has become a greater problem. Nothing has transpired to militate against the advisability of initiating this project at this time were this the original bill. But the road is two-thirds done. It has been well constructed. Whatever opposition, whatever criticism, there was in the method of construction, which in my opinion originated in local jealousies between rival towns along the railroad and in the minds of some disgruntled Alaska politicians—whatever criticism there was has evaporated before the Committee on the Territories when the facts were presented, because every dollar was accounted for; and in this estimate of $17,000,000 which is being asked for now the report of the Interior Department presents to Congress a detailed account of where every dollar of it is to go according to the mileage of the road. It accounts for every shovelful of dirt and every tie and every rail, and it is open to all for inspection. If this bill is passed, this road can not fail to be completed within the time provided in the bill and for the sum sought to be appropriated. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill ought to pass. Congress must make provision for the completion of the Alaskan Railroad. The American people have undertaken that enterprise and they must carry it through, and they will carry it through. This Congress will make provision for the completion of the road. While that is true, it is also true that some things ought to be said during this debate relative to the waste, extravagance, and mismanagement in connection with this enterprise. I do not think we should make available $17,000,000 more upon the theory that everything has gone well up there, that the money has been economically expended, and that the management has been ideal, for that is not true. That it is not true is evidenced by the hearings before the committee and evidenced by every hearing there has been before the Committee on Appropriations since the work was started. It is not true that it is necessary to make available $17,000,000, 50 per cent more than the original estimate, largely or principally because of increased cost of labor and material. As a matter of fact, the smallest increase in wages paid to labor anywhere under the American flag during the war has occurred in Alaska. Wages in Alaska compared with wages on the mainland were high before the war began and when the estimates were made. Curiously enough they did not increase during the war to the extent they did in most parts of the Union. Further, while there has been some increase in the cost of material, a very considerable proportion of the material that has been used was contracted for before the beginning of the war. That is true, as I understand it—and if I am not correct I want to be corrected—with regard to the rails and spikes that have gone into the road up to this time. They were bought or contracted for before the war began and at prewar prices.

There are two principal reasons for the increase over the estimated cost. One is that the estimate was originally too low, and that was declared to be so by quite a number of gentlemen, somewhat familiar with the situation at the time. I at that time predicted that it would be impossible to build this road under the conditions then existing in Alaska under the management that we were likely to have for the sum suggested. The principal reason, however, for this 50 per cent increase in cost is the miserable management of the enterprise, and I make that statement with regret——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Because I have the highest regard for the Secretary of the Interior, his integrity and his judgment, and I realize that a statement of that kind is to a certain extent a reflection upon the Secretary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Was the gentleman in the Hall when his colleague——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] does not want to know the truth.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to ask a question, but the Chair suggests that the point of no quorum has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will suspend. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-seven Members present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7417 and had found itself without a quorum; that he had caused the roll to be called, and that 227 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be recorded in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its sitting.

ROLL CALL IN COMMITTEE.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole desires to make an announcement at this time. The rules under which we are operating require, when a point of no quorum is made in the Committee of the Whole, that the roll shall be called once and only once, and hereafter when the present occupant of the chair is in the chair, on a point of no quorum in committee, if the first call of the roll develops 100 Members present, he will not direct the roll to be called a second time.

ALASKAN RAILROAD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the roll call I had just said that I regretted the necessity of criticizing the management of the Alaskan Railroad, because that criticism reflects somewhat upon a gentleman for whom I have the very highest regard and respect, the Secretary of the Interior, and I was about to say that I realize that a railroad in Alaska is so far away from Washington that even the best-intentioned management from here might not be reflected so far away. I do not intend to reflect upon the Secretary. I am confident he made an earnest effort to secure a good administration, but we have been unfortunate in the management of that railroad. Why, at one time the railroad was built by cable. There was no responsible engineer on the job for a very considerable length of time, and orders were cabled by the engineer at Washington. Under those circumstances it is not remarkable that the management was not of the best——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And the cost, particularly, was high. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman was in the Chamber, I presume, when his colleague, the Member from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], made the statement concerning t. .s legislation——

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I am not responsible for what any other gentleman may say.

Mr. GARNER. But I want to ask the gentleman a question; he yielded for an interruption.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I have a very brief time. I am not responsible for what others may say or for the opinion of others, but my statement is based on my experience as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and of the subcommittee that had charge of appropriations for the Alaskan Railroad.

Mr. GARNER. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And I know from the hearings that it was clear and apparent that the management was not of the character that we might have hoped for.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman heard the gentleman from Kansas give it a clean bill of health and said that it had been economically managed and had been administered without regard to politics, and he evidently had some information from the hearings before the committee which reported this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Now that the gentleman has gotten that statement, that may or may not be accurate, into my speech and is therefore content, I shall go on. The fact remains that there has been gross mismanagement of this railroad and that now we have a road partly built at either end and a wide gap in the center upon which little has been done, we must appropriate a sum or must authorize the appropriation of a sum equal to 50 per cent of the original authorization to carry out the work originally contemplated and in the main because of extravagant methods and failure to establish and maintain a good system of management. So much for that.

There has been more or less said in connection with this discussion with regard to the coal in Alaska. One of the arguments for the building of the Alaskan Railroad was that there were enormously valuable coal fields there and that our expenditure would develop them and make them available not only in Alaska, but on other parts of the Pacific coast. I am not criticizing anybody. I regret the Matanuska coal fields have been a very great disappointment. As one who has had some experience with coal mining and development, I have taken much interest in the Alaskan situation and I have been very hopeful about the Matanuska field, but have thought it was wise to discount the extravagant statements at one time and another by gentlemen in regard to it. Now it develops that up to date no dependable and satisfactory coal mines have been opened in the Matanuska field. That field is unfortunately very badly broken and the efforts to develop a good mine have not been successful up to date. We passed a leasing bill for Alaska, a bill under which the coals of Alaska were to be leased. Certain gentlemen were very enthusiastic about that leasing bill. Well, it has been on the statute books quite a number of years and up to date there is not a single successful mine of considerable tonnage under lease in the Matanuska field under that law.

There are, I think, two leases that are being operated to a limited extent, or two leases that have some life; but our Alaskan leasing law under the conditions of Alaska has been as disappointing as the Matanuska field has been. There is a field in the Behring region that is hopeful, although at the beginning the Matanuska field seemed to be the better of the two. Latterly it seems to have developed that in all probability the Behring field will develop better mines. We have made no effort to develop the Behring field. We have left it to private enterprise, and it is a curious fact that while all our $35,000,000 expenditure on the railroad and our efforts in connection with coal development has not given us a single dependable extensive coal operation in the Matanuska field, private enterprise, unaided by the Government, frowned upon by Government agencies and agents, has or is about to develop very excellent coal mines in the Behring field. The probability seems to be that private enterprise will give us more coal from the Behring field than all of the expenditures of the Government and all of the Government's efforts will give us from the Matanuska field.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DEWALT. Is that due to the quality of the coal of the different fields or is it simply because of this leasing law?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the Behring field—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is familiar with coal measures—the Behring field is very badly broken, broken to an extent that one familiar with the fields of Pennsylvania can scarcely realize.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has control of the time.

Mr. CURRY of California I yield to the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MONDELL. The result is that a continuous operation is difficult because of the faults and the breaks in the vein——

Mr. DEWALT. That is in the Matanuska field?

Mr. MONDELL. That is in the Behring field. Further than that the uplifts have been of a character that have thrust into the body of the coal itself a more or less foreign matter which must be mechanically separated from the coal.

Now, on the other hand, the hope was that the Matanuska field, in a section less disturbed apparently from surface indications than the Behring field, would prove to be a field in which operations could be conducted at a reasonable cost. But the entries at Matanuska have developed a condition of disturbance almost as bad as those of the Behring field, with this difference, that the quality of the coal in the Matanuska field, a considerable portion of it, at least, is not so good as that of the Behring field, though there are some good coals in both fields. The difficulty is to mine and load on cars in condition for satisfactory use at a reasonable cost. So far the cost is a cost that would be considered prohibitive anywhere except in Alaska. If the Matanuska field were in Pennsylvania; if it were in Illinois; if it were in Alabama, it would not be worked at all at the costs in Alaska of mining and producing the coal. There is still some hope that we may eventually develop a considerable amount of very good coal at a tolerable price in Alaska, but up to date little headway has been made in that direction.

I refer to these things for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that in moments of enthusiasm, amounting almost to hysteria, these distant fields were painted in rainbow hues that did not represent their real color and quality. And it is regrettable that we have to confess that the situation is much less favorable than was anticipated by the enthusiasts. The coal fields of Alaska so far have been very disappointing, and the coal-leasing bill for Alaska has been so far a failure, although it may be possible to so administer it as to bring results in the future.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, while we must do this thing, while we must spend this money, while we must finish this road, let us not do it on the theory that everything up there has been as satisfactory as we hoped it would be or as it ought to have been and that the fault is simply with increasing costs, for that is not the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

CALLING OF ROLL IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. I merely want to get this clear, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the recent ruling made by the Chair in regard to the calling of the roll. As I understand, the Chair made this statement: That while he is acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole he proposes after this, when a question of no quorum is raised, to instruct the Clerk to call the roll once, and then if a quorum is developed on the first roll call there will be no second calling of the roll. That is correct, so far, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand a Member will have the privilege, after the roll is called and a quorum is developed, to come in here and stand before the desk and demand that his name be recorded, provided the Chairman has not left the rostrum?

The CHAIRMAN. That is also correct. The Chair would not refuse to recognize any person in the well seeking to be recorded, but if the Chair leaves the rostrum here that privilege will be denied.

Mr. HICKS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the Chair indulge me to make this remark?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. For the very reason that a Member has the right and the Chair will recognize that right, is the reason why I fear the Chairman's good intentions in this matter will come to naught, because it will be found that it will take as long a time to single out the Members individually and have them recorded as it will to proceed as we have been all these years to have a second roll call.

The CHAIRMAN. If the rule is in the record, so long as the present Chairman is in the chair that rule is going to be enforced.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire how the membership is to determine whether or not the present Chairman is in the chair?

The CHAIRMAN. By the eye.

Mr. KING. There are times when the Members are in the House Office Building and on committee work. Can the Chairman give us any light on that proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. Bells are rung, and all persons will be notified that the point of no quorum is made.

Mr. KING. And will some peculiar ring indicate to us or notify us that the present Chairman is in the chair?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is presumed that this order will be followed by any other Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

ALASKAN RAILROAD.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has 22 minutes and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me at this time?

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has just preceded me in the discussion of this question, started out by saying that he was in favor of the bill. He concluded by reasserting that he was in favor of it, but very severely criticized the administration of this railroad. In doing this he called attention to the fact that the commodities that were to be transported over this road were not of such a nature as to justify the construction of the road.

If my recollection is not at fault, after a very thorough and exhaustive discussion of this question in the House when the $35,000,000 was provided for the construction of this road, the gentleman from Wyoming, after hearing the discussion and being thoroughly posted upon all the issues involved, voted for the $35,000,000 appropriation.

In calling attention to the extravagance in the construction of this road, he fails to call attention to the fact that this House of Representatives would not now be in session if it were not for the fact that the high cost of living was such as to induce the President of the United States to ask us to waive the recess which we had provided for, and remain here in session. We do know as a matter of fact that everything has advanced from 50 to 100 per cent, and in some instances more than 100 per cent since the war began.

The gentleman from Wyoming did not raise an objection when it came to voting on the question to increase the salaries of the employees of the Members; that is, the clerks and the secretaries to the Members of Congress. He did not object when it came to allowing those who had contracted for constructing the public buildings in the United States to receive additional compensation. He did not object when it came to allowing $125 extra or a bonus for the workers in the War Risk Bureau or $240 for the other Government employees here. He did not object when we meted out the paltry sum of $150 a year yesterday to the postal employees. Why was this done? Because the price of everything has increased to such an extent that it became necessary that an additional amount should be paid out beyond the sums contemplated and which had been customary before that time.

It was unfair and unjust for the floor leader of the other side of this House to criticize the fact that this railroad, situated as it is out of the United States, many miles away from here, with 5,000 of our young men going into the war, the labor supply being depleted, the cost of transportation being increased, and the cost of every commodity being increased, it was unfair for him to criticize the administration of the Secretary of the Interior because of the fact that this railroad has cost about 40 per cent more than it was contemplated it should cost.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I intend to use only about seven minutes more of my time, and I would like to have the opportunity right at this time of hearing the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] for two minutes. Then I shall use five minutes on this side and close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the question of the Alaskan Railroad and also upon the question of the farmers being the hope of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the question of the Alaskan Railroad and the question of the farmers being the hope of the Nation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that this Alaskan Railroad bill will pass. It is a meritorious measure. There has been considerable money already spent in the construction of this railroad; in fact, nearly $35,000,000. It is now necessary for us to spend this additional amount in order to complete this railroad, in order to carry on the development of Alaska.

It is very essential that Alaska be developed. It is a great country, a great Territory. In fact, Mr. Chairman, it is a great storehouse, and a great many of the good things of the world are locked up in Alaska. In the near future we will unlock that great storehouse, and we will get some of the good things from Alaska. The development of Alaska means a great deal along the line of the development of this country. This railroad is not built for the purpose of making a dividend out of the money invested in the railroad, but it is built for the progress and development of Alaska, and we must develop that great Territory which we own. We must vote for this measure, we must pass it, and by passing it we not only help Alaska, but we also help the United States and the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words along the line of the farmer being the hope of the Nation. I fear that this Congress and the Nation do not properly appreciate the farmer. If we had no farmers, we would have no Nation.

We could have a great nation without railroads, telegraph and telephone lines, automobiles, or cities. In fact, we can get along without almost anything except farmers.

Am I right about this proposition?

Let's see. Why is not there a great nation in Africa in the Sahara Desert? Simply because it is not fertile. It not being fertile and no farmers being there, no nation is built. Why is not there a splendid city in the Okeefinokee Swamp, in my district in Georgia? Simply because none of the swamp except the islands can at present be cultivated, and not being arable no farmers go there and no cities are built.

In the great West large areas of land are dry and parched by the hot sun and because of the lack of rain can not be cultivated in the original state. As long as the land can not be cultivated no development takes place. No railroads are needed for there is nothing to haul. No telephone and telegraph lines are needed for there is no one to use them. There are no cities for there are no farmers to support the cities.

It is a land of the sagebrush, the prairie dog, and the wolf. It is a land of desolation and arid waste. But, Mr. Chairman, an irrigation project is installed. Water is conducted from some river or lake to quench the long thirst of the arid section, and it becomes capable of cultivation; and, oh, my, what a transformation takes place. The farmer leads the way. The land blossoms like a rose. Homes, schools, and churches are built. Great cities spring up. Railroads and electric lines are everywhere. The hum of the factory fills the air. A most magnificent community, modern in every respect, springs up as if by magic.

Who did it? The farmer. Who built our Nation? The farmer. Who gained our independence? The farmer. Who has kept our Nation going since its beginning? The farmer. Who won our great victory in the Great War? The farmer. Who can solve the problem of the high cost of living? The farmer. Who will save this Nation from its downfall? The farmer.

The products of the farm are the very lifeblood of the Nation. The farming, dairying, fruit-growing, and stock-raising industries of our country make the great heart which gives life to the Nation and sends the lifeblood pulsating through her arteries of commerce.

A man can live as easily without a heart as the United States can live without the farmer.

The farmer is not only the heart of the Nation but he is the very life and soul of the Republic. If you would injure a man, injure his heart. If you would injure our great country, injure the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, when a question is presented here in Congress for consideration, I ask myself the question, Will the measure help the farmer and the farmer's folks or hurt them?

If it will help the farmer, I am for it, first, last, and all the time. If it will hurt him, I am bitterly opposed to it. If we all will use this yardstick as our guide we will never go wrong.

Help the farmer and you help all the people, for the farmer, by his labor, helps all mankind. Hurt the farmer and you hurt all the human race, for when the farmer suffers all suffer.

If we would solve properly the problem of the high cost of living, we must help the farmer and he will solve it for us. He will solve it not only for the present but for all time to come. He produces all we eat and all we wear. Try living awhile without eating anything the farmer makes. You will perish. Try living awhile without wearing any clothing made from the materials produced by the farmer, and as a result you will go naked and roost on the fence.

Let us get out of our heads the idea that the farmer gets too much for his products. The farmer does not get too much for what he produces. He does not get enough. He never has received too much. He feeds and clothes the whole world for just a little more than what he eats and wears himself. He sells cotton at 30 cents a pound and buys it back manufactured at $3 a pound, and ofttimes at $10 to $15 a pound. He sells hams at $6 each. If he were to buy one ham back in ham sandwiches he would pay about $75 for it.

According to present high prices, farmers ought to get 75 cents per pound for cotton.

If possible, we ought to lower the high cost of living by paying the farmer more and the people between the farmer and the consumer less. The farmer should receive more for his products so that farming will be more profitable, and so more farming will be done and so a greater production will result.

Farming should be as profitable as possible, so as to stimulate a greater yield and so as to feed and clothe properly the world. Farming has not been profitable enough and too many are leaving the farms and flocking to the cities, and we are suffering now, in a large measure, as a result of this fact.

It would be great legislation for this Congress to enact laws to help the farmer produce more for less cost so as to make his business very profitable, even at present prices.

The man is worse than blind who thinks that to fleece the farmer is economy or good sense. The man in this Congress who would legislate against the farmer is either not patriotic or is mislead.

Let us be not deceived. Let us legislate for all the Nation, but let us remember that when we legislate for the farmer we legislate for all, for the farmer feeds and clothes them all. We may help others without helping the farmer. We may hurt the farmer by helping others. We can not benefit the farmer without benefiting all, for all are dependent on him. He is the support of the Nation and we can not afford to do less than support every move in his behalf.

We, in justice to ourselves and humanity, must fight everything that would hinder, impede, or hurt the farmer.

We must look to the farmer to reduce the high cost of living.

Instead of opposing his farming operations we must encourage them. We need more foodstuffs and more cotton. I live in the cotton-growing section and know that the farmers of that section will plant less and less cotton from time to time if legislation is forced through which is injurious to them. They can not continue to grow cotton unless they get a better price for their cotton, and unless we legislate for them and not against them.

If there is a material shortage of a cotton crop the Nation suffers. If you want to solve the problem of the high cost of living, give the farmer a square deal, and he will help you solve it just like he and his family helped win the war, and have always helped in everything worth while.

The following letter has been sent by the editor of the Manufacturer's Record to every cotton manufacturer in the United States and to a large number in England, as well as to leading papers in this country and abroad, in order that the crisis now facing the world's cotton trade may bring forth intelligent discussion of this important matter:

BALTIMORE, MD., July 24, 1919.

To cotton manufacturers of New England and elsewhere:

In 1904, when the International Cotton Manufacturers' Congress, held in Switzerland, voiced the world's need for an increased production of cotton, every address made emphasized that the cotton supply of the world was running short of the world's needs, and yet, so far as I can remember, only one delegate said that the way to produce increased production was through higher prices. All others wanted more cotton, but wanted cheaper cotton.

The crisis in the world's cotton trade which was then foreseen is now practically upon us. For several years the cotton crop of the South has been small, and this year promises to be very small. I am not surprised at this. For years I have taken the ground that the South would decrease its cotton crop unless prices ruled for a long time at very much higher figures than in former years. The whole situation has been completely changed. The economic slavery which has held the South to the cotton plow has been broken. Diversified farming and employment in industrial pursuits offered to the men of the South a far more profitable employment than can be found in the cotton field. If cotton growing in the South is to hold the laborers on the farm they must receive far higher wages than they have ever had. The laborer is no longer at the mercy of one underpaid industry. He is now a free man. This applies to the white laborer as well as to the black. Every effort which has been made in the past to hold down the price of cotton has been an effort, unconscious, perhaps, to hold in complete slavery or poverty, indebtedness, and ignorance the tenant farmers, white and black, in the South, and the day laborers on cotton farms. The cotton producers have had a right to resent very vigorously the most unwise statement put out some months ago by Mr. R. N. Durfee, chairman of the cotton-buying committee of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers. Mr. Durfee undertook to demand that the cotton growers of the South should increase their production without regard to whether it paid them to do so or not, and without regard to the fact that they could help themselves and help the South far more by raising an increased food supply than by raising more cotton. I do not believe that Mr. Durfee represented the better views of the broad-minded cotton manufacturers and people of New England when he so bitterly criticized the South and southern cotton growers. Certainly every statement such as his put out by a cotton manufacturer or by a New England paper only serves to intensify the irritation which cotton growers feel toward the manufacturers and inevitably develops and foments a bitter spirit of sectionalism, with New England responsible for this unfortunate situation. I am sure that this is not the spirit of the people of New England as a whole.

It would have been infinitely better for the South if it had never raised a bale of cotton. Its farmers can turn from cotton to diversified agriculture to their own advancement, and to the enrichment of the South, and if the South should abandon cotton growing or fail to increase its cotton crop, a tremendous disaster would come upon the cotton manufacturers of the whole country, and, indeed, upon the whole world.

There is no more moral obligation resting upon the South to raise cotton when it can raise something else to more profit than there is upon a capitalist to manufacture cotton goods when he could to greater profit to himself produce foodstuffs.

The entire cotton industry has reached the turning point, and we have entered upon a new epoch. Cotton will never again come back to the low prices of former years. The southern cotton grower will no longer be placed on a level with the underpaid cotton raisers of India or Egypt. They will, on the other hand, demand and secure a price for cotton which will give to the landowner, the tenant farmer, and the farm hand an income in keeping with the profit paid to the wheat grower of the West, a section which has grown enormously rich on diversified agriculture, while the South has for itself made little or no profit on its cotton production.

I am anxious that the cotton manufacturers of New England especially, but likewise of the whole country, should fully understand this situation. I have no thought that the position taken by Mr. Durfee in the letter which he issued a few months ago voiced the sentiment of the New England cotton manufacturers. I do not believe that they want to hold the white or the black man in the South in grinding poverty and economic slavery, and in ignorance, which has of necessity existed because the tenant farmer could only raise his cotton at the prices which formerly prevailed by keeping his wife and his children in the cotton field.

The average tenant farmer in the South produces about five or six bales of cotton a year as his chief and, in many cases, almost only product, though of recent years tenant farmers are beginning to return to the system which prevailed prior to the Civil War—of raising some of their feedstuffs and foodstuffs. When cotton sold at 10 cents a pound, or $50 a bale, the average tenant farmer received about $300 a year as the gross income for his work and that of his wife and children. Out of this had to come a heavy fertilizer bill and the landowner's share of one-third to one-half, in place of a cash rent for land. You can readily see, therefore, that under these conditions these tenant farmers lived in constant poverty, and rarely ended a year free of debt.

It is important that there should be a better understanding between the cotton manufacturers of the country and the cotton growers not only for the benefit of the industry but for a broad spirit of patriotism and humanity. Nearly every voice which has come to the South from the press and the manufacturers of New England and Europe has been a demand for cheap cotton; but, fortunately, some New England manufacturers have been wise enough to see that cheap cotton was a curse to the South, and have freely taken that position.

It is possible to bring about a much better understanding and a closer business sentiment between the cotton growers and cotton consumers if the cotton manufacturers will fully understand the situation and give voice to this sentiment in favor of a living price for the cotton producers.

The flour millers of the country and the consumers of corn are not ceaselessly fighting high prices on wheat and corn, and yet wheat which in 1896 averaged for the year 49½ cents a bushel is now $2.26 per bushel and over, and corn, which in that year averaged 21½ cents per bushel for the entire country, is now selling at about $1.80 to $2 per bushel, according to locality. You can readily see that the southern farmer, who has to buy his wheat and corn in order to raise cotton, is placed at a tremendous disadvantage by reason of these high prices of wheat and corn.

I also quote the following from the Manufacturer's Record of July 31, 1919:

Not only this country but the world needs an enormous increase in output. We shall need to stretch the production of agriculture to the utmost limit of our ability to secure labor. The demand for cotton and for foodstuffs will for years run ahead of the supply. We must feed up and clothe up hundreds of millions of people who for five years have been short on food and on clothes. We must catch up on the slack of the last five years, and when we have caught up we must stock up, for it is a great mistake to permit consumption to tread so closely on the heels of production. It has been well said that we are never removed from famine more than one brief season, for one complete crop failure in this country, whether of wheat or corn, would mean a world famine. A complete failure of cotton, indeed, a crop much less than that which is now anticipated, would be a world disaster.

Production and more production and more production must be preached wherever men gather, if we would give safety to our Government and safety to the world.

If we are to act wisely, we must help the man that helps us. We must save the man that saved us. We must help and save the farmer. We can not afford to make heavier his burden of taxation. We should lessen his burden. We should help the farmer to get better roads. We should help him, in every way possible, to get a better yield and help him to get a fair price for his crop. We should help the farmer's boys and girls get better school advantages. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we must help make the farm life desirable and even preferable to city life.

Good legislation is that which makes happy, contented, enlightened, and prosperous the great army that toils and produces. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] is recognized.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from California desire to use any time now?

Mr. CURRY of California. Does the gentleman wish to use any time?

Mr. WATKINS. We have five minutes on this side. A gentleman who was to speak has been called to the telephone, but he will be back presently.

Mr. CURRY of California. We have but one speech on this side. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to speak for a few moments from the standpoint of one who has been over Alaska and who knows something about the country and the trials and troubles of the men who are there undertaking to develop that far-off land. In order to visualize something of the magnitude of Alaska, I shall illustrate by this little map. If you place the southeast point of southeastern Alaska upon a map of the United States at Savannah, Ga., the southwest point would be at Los Angeles, Calif., and it would occupy the entire area of States of North Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Washington, Oregon, and a part of northern California.

It is an immense territory. As to area, it is larger than everything east of the Mississippi River and north of the south Tennessee line. So that to go to one point of Alaska, you could tell just about as much of what is beyond you as to go to the port of New York and undertake to describe what is west of Chicago.

It is a wonderful country in the matter of climate. I want to call your attention to the fact that along the entire Pacific coast, and particularly southeastern Alaska, the climate is profoundly affected by the Japanese current. The icebound port of Vladivostok in Siberia, which is icebound seven months in the year, is 2,000 miles south of Seward, Alaska, where this railroad starts, and which is an open port the year around. Vladivostok is 500 miles south of the city where I live. Vladivostok is directly west of the northern California line. On this side we grow oranges and grapes, and on the other side of the Pacific are the icebound ports of Siberia.

So much as to climatic conditions, and it is not a bad climate. But it is an enormous country, with 21,000 miles of coast line, following the bays and inlets, and out of that coast line 3,000 miles are mineralized. It is the greatest mineralized belt on the face of the earth. There is every mineral known to mineralogy in Alaska, and I believe that when developed it will be the richest mineral country on the face of the earth.

I have had old men tell me——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. My good friend will pardon me, as I have just a few minutes. I have had old miners and prospectors tell me that it is their judgment if all the gold of Alaska was dumped on the markets of the earth at once it would demonetize the metal. There is everything there, and I tell you, gentlemen of the House, it is a country well worth our attention.

You see the plan: This is a small map of Alaska. This railway cuts it right through the heart north and south, extending from Seward, in southeastern Alaska, north to the city of Fairbanks, almost at the head of navigation of the Tanana River.

Now, something has been said about commencing this railroad at two points, one from Seward and the other from Fairbanks. That is true, and there is a gap in the middle which this $17,000,000 appropriation will complete and, in addition to that, equip the railroad with its rolling stock. This railroad was started from the south and extended to the north from the vicinity of Anchorage and Seward. Then the northern arm was started at Fairbanks. The material for that was taken around through the Bering Sea, up the Yukon River, up the Tanana River to Fairbanks, and then they commenced to build from that end. There is no criticism of that, because it is just the way we started to build the Panama Canal—starting at both ends. We all know that. It is the natural, sensible way to do it.

I have nothing to say about the management of the railroad by those who have had it in charge. I am very anxious that the men up there, who have been waiting for years and years for some development, may see their hopes realized, so anxious that I will close my lips to any criticism.

I have been over nearly all of Alaska, except that part which lies north of the great bend of the Yukon River and northward to the Arctic Ocean. South of it I am fairly familiar with it. I know men who have gone into that country with packs on their back and in the winter season with dog teams, carrying and teaming their provisions for hundreds of miles. I have done it myself, going back into the hills. I have teamed what few provisions I had 200 or 300 miles with a dog team out to where my diggings were. The men who will develop Alaska are the men who will go there with pick and shovel and dig down where nature has hidden her treasure box and bring out to us the virgin gold. They are the kind of men who make a nation great and strong and rich.

There are fewer people in Alaska now than there were 10, 15, or 20 years ago.

I shall say nothing regarding the conservation idea, because in due time that will all be set right, for we are now living in a practical age. The time will come when that country will be opened up to the men who live there, the men whose hands hold the pick and shovel.

This railroad goes through the very heart of the greatest mineralized country in the world, and from this railroad they will put out feeders to the right and to the left—not railroads, but trails, so that the boys can get back into the hills, back to where the gold and the silver and the copper and the coal are located. Then when they are found in sufficient quantities to justify a branch line of the railroad, it may be extended into that locality. As it is now designed, it reaches the great Matanuska coal field.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MILLER. I have only a few minutes, but I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to say that the Alaska coal fields had turned out to be an utter disappointment. Is that the state of affairs or not?

Mr. MILLER. That is not my understanding, I am frank to say. Now, we should build the trails back from the railroad, so that the miners can get back into the hills. The great Klondike gold fields were discovered accidentally. All gold discoveries are all more or less accidental; but the more men who go into a country prospecting, the more men have the facilities to live there, it stands to reason the greater likelihood of valuable discoveries and permanent development. I am enthusiastic in behalf of this railroad. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. I have some time left, and I yield it to the gentleman.

Mr. CURRY of California. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. MILLER. I want to say to my colleagues that the greatest copper mines on the face of the earth are within the Territory of Alaska. You know how we searched the world for metals during the war, how we brought them from beyond the sea, from every place we could get them, to help us in our war program. We have 99 per cent of them in Alaska. They are there awaiting the hand that will develop them. And while we are talking about doing something for the returned soldier, why not open up Alaska as we opened up the great prairies of the West to the soldiers at the close of the Civil War?

Something has been said here of the reindeer situation. There is no prettier sight in all this world than to see a thousand head of reindeer grazing on a mountain side. The Aleutian Islands are full of them. There are 150,000 or 160,000 reindeer in Alaska. They are a godsend to the natives. They go out with their little herds. An Indian or an Eskimo may not have over 25 or 30 reindeer, but he herds them as a careful husbandman takes care of his little flock of sheep. Incidentally they are cleaning out the wolves and lynxes and the other predatory animals that infest the country. The reindeer support the natives. And I truly believe that with the great grazing lands that there are in Alaska, the future development of the reindeer as a substantial source of meat supply for our country is one of the most promising that we have before us.

Now, the climate there is not bad. Over in the interior, in the Yukon Valley, the atmosphere is dry, and with the temperature 25° below zero you can wear an ordinary hat all day long and your ears will not get cold. When you go out to the coast you get the moisture. Going away from the coast into the Yukon Valley you go over a mountain chain some 4,000 feet high, and when you get over that chain you are in the great Arctic slope. I have come out of that valley with the thermometer 42° below zero, where I could stay out doors all day without discomfort, and have dropped over that mountain chain only 30 miles and come out to the coast where the thermometer was 8° below zero and have nearly perished with the cold. The interior is a cold, dry climate. Animals can forage all winter in the interior country.

As this railroad strikes north it goes through the very heart of the land that has the agricultural possibilities, and also where the mineral possibilities are far beyond those of any other nation in the world.

It would surprise some of you to know that in that country the ground is eternally frozen. No one has ever dug through the frost, and they have been down a thousand feet.

The fields of barley and rye and wheat are grown on the top of ground that is frozen for a thousand feet beneath. It thaws on the surface in the summer time. It gets very warm. There is daylight 16, 18, and 24 hours in the day, and crops mature quickly. They come right up overnight. Of course, in the winter the nights are long and dark and cold, but the summer seasons are delightful. The thermometer goes up to 80, 90, and 95 in summer, but in the winter it becomes exceedingly cold. The coldest weather I ever saw in the Yukon Valley was 68° below zero. That is cold weather, and it is dangerous weather; but as you go down the Yukon River, and perhaps 500 miles from the mouth, there is a Catholic mission, the Holy Cross Mission. There is one of the most beautiful apple orchards I have ever seen, perhaps 80 acres of the most beautiful young apple trees just coming into bearing. And grazing over broad acres of clover was one of the finest herds of Jersey cattle I have ever seen. All that in a land that is frozen. It is a queer country. Every rule of the geologists is reversed when you get to Alaska. And I tell you, gentlemen, just as sure as God, the future will unfold for Alaska and the American people the wealthiest possession held by any nation in the world. Mineral, agriculture, fisheries, stock raising—everything future development. It is the golden land of promise for the coming generation. All they want is your help. Come and help them. Let us have 250,000 people in Alaska. Five thousand of the young men there came to the defense of our country in the times of war, patriotic men, although it is by far the most remote from the seat of government of any land on the continent.

They want your help. When a man opposes Alaska it is because he does not know, he has never seen the country. Some of the most beautiful mountain scenery in all the world is in that country. When you look way back to the great mountain peaks it looks to me almost like the shores of time. One of the most beautiful sights I have ever seen. The country has an invigorating climate, it is strenuous, and it breeds hardy men. Gentlemen, help build Alaska and the Alaskan Railroad and the time will come when the American people will be as proud of Alaska and as proud of this railroad as they are now of the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the Alaskan bill was originally up, appropriating $35,000,000, I had the pleasure of supporting it. After investigation of the work up to the present time and the expenditures of that money, save two million and some odd thousand dollars, we find no real criticism. We find the work has progressed rapidly under the conditions confronting the administration of the work. We find it has been built cheaper than most privately constructed railroads during the same time. No one has charged any wrongful act or any real criticism of the commission or secretary having charge of this particular work. Of course, you can always criticize if you desire. They deserve the commendation of the American people for the splendid work that has been done up to date.

There has been a good deal of discussion adverse to Alaska and its interests, to the end that a few private individuals would gather up the coal fields of Alaska. Legislation was passed some three years ago that was satisfactory to the House, the Senate, the President, and the country, authorizing the lease of the coal fields of Alaska. No valid criticism has been made of that legislation. No one has offered an amendment to repeal that law, and day before yesterday the Senate passed a coal and oil leasing bill for the States which contains more drastic provisions than the Alaskan coal-leasing bill, from which they borrowed many of its provisions.

Now, the matter of starting the road at Fairbanks and constructing toward the ocean and from Seward inward is but the method employed by all great continental railroads that have been built. When they built the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads they did the same way, and they joined in Utah.

The legislation requested is made absolutely necessary by virtue of the increased cost of material, labor, and so forth. The $17,000,000 authorized by this bill will undoubtedly, under present conditions, authorize the completion of the work and complete the construction of the railroad so that it can be used from the coast to the farthest point inland.

As has been so well said, and so much better than could have been said by those who have not been there, by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER], the development of the coal and mineral fields in the near future will be to this country what the West was to it when we needed the gold and the minerals.

We ought not now to tie it up or permit it to be tied up in any way when by a reasonable expenditure we can build the road, and in a few years it will return to the Government every dollar placed in this fund for the present construction of the road.

It will aid in the development of the coal mines so that we can obtain reasonably priced coal on the Pacific coast. It will open up the coal mines and all other developments in Alaska so much needed at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and without taking any more time, because I believe the bill will be passed unanimously, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that request should be made in the House; but if there is no objection, the Chair will put it. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," be amended by inserting at the conclusion of section 2 the following:

"Provided, That in order to complete on or before December 31, 1922, the construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, together with necessary sidings, spurs, and lateral branches, the additional sum of $17,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be immediately and continuously available until expended."

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7417 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill. The first question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY of California, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

MONDAY, September 8, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, from our earliest beginnings of national life we have committed our way to Thee. We still seek Thy guidance in all that we do as a people. We pray not only for prosperity or even for peace but we pray that we may have the spirit of Him who, though He was rich, for our sake became poor and took upon Himself the burdens of the world that He might lead us to God and the life eternal. We pray that we may in the spirit of Christ address ourselves to the tasks of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THE DISTRICT POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. MYERS. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read at length.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 105) with reference to payment of compensation to the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That no money now, heretofore, or hereafter appropriated by the Congress for the pay, salaries, or maintenance of the Metropolitan police department or the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia shall be paid to any member, officer, policeman, or patrolman of such force or such department or of the District of Columbia who shall be a member of any organization of policemen or patrolmen which is affiliated, directly or indirectly, with any other labor organization or any branch or body of organized labor; and that the auditor of the District of Columbia and the Auditor for the Treasury Department and all other auditors and auditing officials of the United States Government be, and are hereby ordered, directed, and commanded not to audit or approve any claims, warrants, or vouchers for services by any such member, officer, policeman, or patrolman under such circumstances; and that the Treasurer of the United States and all other officials are hereby ordered, directed, and commanded not to pay or cash any claim, warrant, or voucher of any such member, officer, policeman, or patrolman under such circumstances.

SEC. 2. That all auditing and disbursing officials of the District of Columbia and of the United States Government shall be governed in the matters and orders herein set forth, made, and provided by such action in the premises as may be taken and such notice as may be given by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and it shall be the duty of such board to notify and keep informed all necessary auditing and disbursing officials of the District of Columbia and of the United States from time to time of the names of all such members, officers, policemen, and patrolmen of such police department or such police force as may be members of any such organization of policemen as is herein described and prescribed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks about the joint resolution which I have just introduced. First, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be so referred.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there has been considerable said in the Senate in the last few days about the inadvisability, the impropriety, and the unwisdom of permitting the police force of the District of Columbia to associate or affiliate itself with any superior body of organized labor. It has been pointed out very clearly that to allow such to be done would put the police department in a position where the Government could not always expect and might not always get from the police force undivided allegiance and unswerving attention to the Government's business.

I agree with very much that has been said in the Senate on that subject in the last few days, but it will take more than words to accomplish anything. It has been stated here very pertinently that Congress should intervene and exercise the power it has by virtue of being in control of appropriations made for the police force and prohibit any such action. With that I agree; but it will take more than mere words to accomplish it. It will require more than deprecation or denunciation to have any effect. It will take action to have effect and, as no one else has seen fit to do so, being in accord with most of the sentiments that have been expressed in the Senate on the subject, I have decided to take it upon myself to start action in this matter.

I do not believe the police officers of the country, those who hold in their hands the preservation of the peace and the enforcement of the laws of the country, should have any allegiance or owe any duty to any authority whatsoever other than that of the Government which they serve. I believe that allegiance, that duty, should be supreme, exclusive, and undivided, and to permit anything else I think would be very unwise and improper and would be detrimental to the preservation of American liberty and the perpetuation of American institutions.

Organized labor has been treated very liberally by this administration. Its rights to organize and act collectively have been recognized and confirmed. Its right to be exempt from the provisions of the Clayton antitrust law has been decreed by legislation. Its right to picket by peaceful means and to indulge in picketing by moral suasion has been upheld and confirmed by the courts. I think that is going quite far enough. I do not believe it should be permitted to get control of the police forces of the country. I think that would be going entirely too far. I think a police force should recognize but one authority, one duty, one allegiance, one master, without anything to detract therefrom.

Police officers are supposed to execute the law against all alike, against all classes alike, and to have no more affiliation, sympathy, or allegiance with one class of citizens, in the discharge of their duty, than with another class; and I think it is absolutely necessary to the preservation of the Government and enforcement of law that that status should be preserved.

Police officers are supposed to execute the law and to know no body and no class of people in doing it. That is quite as necessary to the end of good government in executive as in judicial officers. Suppose an action were brought in court before a judge who is a member of the American Federation of Labor and people belonging to the American Federation of Labor were parties to the litigation; that judge would not be allowed to try the case. Would it be right that he be allowed to try the case? It would not be right. It would not be tolerated. Suppose a controversy were litigated between striking members of a labor union and a street railway company and the judge upon the bench were a stockholder in the railway company; would he be permitted to sit on that case? Would it be right for him to be permitted to sit on that case? It is unthinkable. He should not be permitted to do so and would not be. There is an element of fairness and justice in these things that must be patent.

Therefore, police officers who have in their hands the enforcement of the law and the enforcement of the decisions of the courts should have no affiliation with one class of people more than another. They are paid by all the people and they should keep themselves in a position to serve all the people alike, with equal impartiality and fairness. They are paid at the expense of all the taxpayers, and the whole people have a right to expect that they will discharge their duties at all times and under all circumstances without having any more affiliation or connection with one class of people than with another class of people, without being under obligation to one class more than another. That always has been the theory of this Government and that status should be preserved. It is necessary to good government and a fair administration of the law. I have no prejudice against organized labor. My record in this body shows that I have no prejudice against it. Organized labor can find no fault, I apprehend, with the most of my record in this body; but, while I believe organized labor should have its rights, I do not believe it should have at the hands of the Government anything which could interfere with the just, fair, and impartial administration of the law as to all classes of the people alike. I assert that to be good American doctrine.

I believe that troublous times are confronting this country. I believe that a crisis is confronting this country which is fully as grave as any that confronted it during the existence of the war with Germany. I believe there is a well-planned determination in certain quarters to sovietize the industries of this country. The railroad brotherhoods have demanded that the railroads of the country be nationalized, as they call it, which is nothing more than sovietized. They have threatened to starve the people into submission to their demands. There is evidence that the coal miners' unions of the country have determined to sovietize the coal mines of the country, and they have accompanied their determination with threats to freeze the people into submission. I read in the newspapers of 1,500 armed union miners in West Virginia marching into a neighboring county to compel the unionization of the coal mines of that section. I read of a large band of coal miners in Illinois marching over the country and demanding that their fellow coal miners suspend work and stop the production of coal, on the eve of winter, and freeze the people of the country into submission to their demands.

We have almost daily socialist conventions and communist conventions and pacifist conventions, and whatnot conventions—nondescript conventions—in the country, demanding that Tom Mooney, Eugene Debs, Alexander Berkmann, Emma Goldman, and other so-called political prisoners be pardoned and forthwith released from prison. We have reports of some labor unions meeting here and there and demanding that a nation-wide strike be put in force to procure the discharge from prison of Tom Mooney. We have conventions demanding that the industries of this country be sovietized and lauding to the skies the soviet government of Russia. Strikes occur almost daily, and the country is rife with threats of more strikes, and more serious ones.

Now, at this time comes a movement of the American Federation of Labor to control the police forces of the country. I think it very significant, and I, for one, am willing to say to labor, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." I think the time has come to say it, and I think Congress is the body to say it. It may involve the destruction of some political lives; and if so, I am willing to offer my political life as the first victim on the altar of my country. I would far rather retire to private life than to serve in public life under any other conditions than being governed solely by my own conscientious convictions of duty and an undivided allegiance to the flag of my country and to the Government which I have sworn to uphold and defend.

I believe the unionization of Government employees has gone too far, as it is, without further extension. Already the employees of all the executive departments of the Government are thoroughly unionized and whenever they want anything they demand it of Congress and have back of their demands the entire force and power of all organized labor in the country; and we know what a tremendous power and influence that brings to bear upon Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure, to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose the Senator from Montana knows from personal experience that the associations of the national employees have their legislative committees and delegates, and I have no doubt the Senator, like others, has been called out upon the carpet in the lobbies and received instructions from these gentlemen as to how he should vote concerning increases of compensation and other matters affecting not so much the public service as the means and desires of the organizations themselves.

Mr. MYERS. I can not say that I have received "instructions," but I have received some very earnest requests and have had some very serious interviews on the subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Has not the Senator also received in that connection communications from Federal employees in his own district——

Mr. MYERS. Oh, yes; I have received many of them.

Mr. THOMAS. Containing veiled threats or assurances as to what will be or what will not be done according as his action shall be one way or the other here?

Mr. MYERS. I have received some very pointed communications.

Mr. THOMAS. So have I.

Mr. MYERS. The employees of the Post Office Department furnish an example of the extent to which the unionization of Government employees has been carried. There is a very active and vigilant union of the postal employees of the country. They have been holding conventions of their organization in different sections of the country in the last few days, and some of the proceedings of some of those conventions, as I read them, I think are improper, unseemly, and out of place.

At one of those conventions it was very seriously suggested that, unless certain demands upon Congress for increase of wages and other concessions be granted, the employees of the Post Office Department all go out on a strike—absolutely go out and walk away from the Government business and leave it unattended to, with nobody to carry it on. If they should go out on a strike, I suppose the next thing would be for them to resort to picketing, to keep other people from being put in their places. Then, if the police forces of the country were unionized and affiliated with a superior body of organized labor and if any disturbance ensued, as a result of the strike and the picketing, the union policemen would be called out to preserve the peace as between those who were doing the picketing and those whom the Government had called to take the places of striking employees; which, I think, would be a most deplorable condition of affairs and one which should not be permitted under any circumstances to arise.

At one of those conventions of post-office employees it is reported that one of the delegates—I think an official of the organization—made a most denunciatory and abusive speech about the head of the department, the Postmaster General. I do not know what grounds post-office employees may have for thinking they have grievances against the head of that department, but, so far as I know, the Postmaster General has discharged the duties of his department in a very fair and efficient way. I think he has tried to do so. Others may feel that they have grounds for holding a different opinion; but I think it is scandalous, unseemly, and improper for a delegate to a convention of organized post-office employees to arise in convention and make a public speech and in it denounce and abuse the head of the department for which he is working. I think it is productive of insubordination and is not compatible with the good of the department. It is a reflection on the President of the United States. It is an insinuation that the President is willfully keeping in his Cabinet an official whom he knows to be incompetent and who is not doing his duty. I do not think it ought to be permitted; but it will be permitted; it has been done, it is being done, and will continue to be done. This is a result of unionization and affiliation with superior labor bodies of Government employees. It produces insubordination. I presume if such an employee were removed from office it would raise a great disturbance, and would probably bring on a strike of the other employees of the department.

We have had here in Congress some instances of the power of employees of the Government when unionized and affiliated with superior labor organizations, and backed by the force and power of the allied union organizations of the country. During the war with Germany, when some of us thought that Government employees, who received from $90 to $200 a month, should work eight hours a day for the period of the war, while our soldiers in France were fighting in the trenches 24 hours a day for $30 a month, the entire power of organized labor with which the employees of the Government were affiliated was brought to bear upon Congress to defeat that measure. Congress, however, enacted the measure, but it was vetoed, and the author of the measure, the late Representative Borland, of Missouri, was defeated for another term. It was openly announced at the time, by some of the leaders of labor with whom the employees of the Government were affiliated, that Representative Borland would be defeated, as a warning and an example, I suppose, to other Members of Congress.

I believe the time has come for Congress to act. It is now proposed and demanded that a more serious and ominous step be taken in the unionization of Government employees than any yet. It is demanded that the police forces of the country unionize and be allowed to affiliate with and put themselves under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor. Few Members of this body have voted for more measures than I for the alleviation of the conditions of labor; few Members of this body are willing to go further to protect all legitimate rights of organized labor than I; but I am willing to go so far and no further. I do not believe it would be a wise or prudent thing for Congress to sit idly by and permit the American Federation of Labor, or any other labor organization, to get control of the police forces of the country. I think that is going too far and demanding too much. I think the time has come for Congress to assert itself in the premises. We have a duty to perform. We should be true to it and firm in its discharge. We should not hesitate, flinch, or shirk. We represent the whole people—all of them, not a part of them. We should look well to the interest of the whole people.

We should act without partiality, without fear or favor of any. Therefore, I want to see this resolution referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I want prompt action on it by the committee. I hope for prompt action; I want a report on the resolution; I do not want it delayed or pigeonholed or sidetracked or overlooked. If it can not have a favorable report, I want it to have an unfavorable report, so it may come before this body in some form, so that this body may go on record as to its attitude in relation thereto. When reported, I want the Senate to go on record about it. The Senate owes a duty to the country upon this issue. It confronts us. It should not be avoided.

I think the time has come for Members of Congress to stand up and be counted. Every Member of this body knows whether or not he is in favor of the police forces of the country being affiliated with a superior body of organized labor; there is no middle ground; there is no neutral position; and I think the time has come when each of us ought to say whether or not he is in favor of it. I think the country expects it of us and has a right to expect it of us. If a majority of the Members of Congress shall say they are in favor of it, I would be willing to submit, as a good citizen, to the rule of the majority; the minority would have to submit; but I think the country is entitled to an expression of opinion from Congress on the subject and ought to have it.

If the police department of the District of Columbia is permitted to affiliate with a superior body of organized labor, you may be sure that the police forces all over the country will follow suit and do the same thing. In every city and town in the United States of more than 5,000 population you will find that the police forces of the country will be speedily unionized and affiliated with a superior body of organized labor.

I do not believe the people of this country are in favor of that; nor do I believe that it would meet with their approval; but they can only act through their duly accredited and delegated representatives, whom they have vested with authority to represent them and act in such matters. If it is permitted in the District of Columbia, it will be taken as an example for the remainder of the country.

It is true this matter is in the courts and the hands of the District Commissioners are temporarily tied, but it may be in the courts a long time. There is no telling how long it will be in the courts; very likely either side, if it may lose the decision in the trial court, will appeal, and it is likely to be in the courts for six months or more.

I notice in a morning paper of this city that some of the officials of organized labor in the city are complaining that the District Commissioners are coercing members of the police force into resigning from their police union. There are criminations and recriminations. I think the squabble that is going on in the District of Columbia between organized labor and the District Commissioners, involving the courts, is unseemly and detrimental and out of place; and I believe Congress ought to register its will in the premises and put a stop to it in one way or another. While this matter is now in the courts, the introduction or passage of this joint resolution should not be taken by the courts or any other authority or by any body at all as in any manner indicating a belief on the part of Congress, or any Member of Congress, that there is not sufficient law now to enable the District Commissioners to forbid and prevent policemen of the District from affiliating themselves with a superior body of organized labor. If this were a bill to prevent it, the courts might say that Congress, having under consideration a bill to prevent it, perhaps felt that the existing law did not prevent it, and that Congress was undertaking to remedy a defect in the existing law; but this is not a bill. It is merely a joint resolution of Congress addressed to certain administrative officers of the Government directing them not to do certain things, no matter what the law may be. It simply undertakes to direct certain administrative officers as to the manner of the discharge of certain of their duties, and can in no wise affect the substantive law that is now on the statute books in one way or another.

It is not untimely nor inopportune. I think it entirely proper and appropriate. It is intended to end summarily an unseemly contention of uncertain duration.

I know that a presidential election is coming on next year, and I am aware that there has been much disposition on both sides of this Congress to jockey and play for advantageous position in the approaching presidential election; but in matters of this kind I think we should put our country above party. In matters pertaining to the welfare of my country I put my country above my party and above any party, and I think all of us should do so. In party matters I am as much of a Democrat as I ever was; but in nonpartisan matters, in matters which are not properly party matters there never was a time in my life when party ties rested more lightly on me than they do now. I think there are arising many things of the most vital and momentous importance to this country which should have nothing to do with party and in which we should put America first and forget political parties and party advantages; and I think this is one of them, and I hope for speedy action on this joint resolution. If it should be attended with any political fatalities, and if I should be one to go down under it, I will go down with undivided allegiance to my country, with unfaltering devotion to its welfare, with unswerving loyalty to my Government—a Government established by Washington, for which Jackson fought, for which Lincoln died, and for which any of us ought to be willing, if necessary, to give up our political lives and to make any sacrifice, however great, that may be required. I put the welfare of my country first and foremost.

THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. NEW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 180), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN EUROPE AND SIBERIA.

Mr. McCORMICK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 181), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas American troops have been engaged in military operations in Russia and in Siberia, although under the Constitution and the laws the United States is not at war with the Russian people or with any government of the Russian people;

Whereas other American troops now have been ordered to Siberia and to Silesia;

Whereas the treaty with Germany provides that American military forces shall be maintained in Europe for 15 years: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no additional troops be sent overseas except by the express authority of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that all troops serving in Europe and Siberia should be brought home with the utmost dispatch.

PARADE OF THE FIRST DIVISION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, which were, on page 2, line 1, to strike out "Tuesday, September 16" and insert "Wednesday, September 17"; strike out the preamble, and amend the title to read as follows: "Joint resolution making Wednesday, September 17, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 7417. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD certain speeches made by the President of the United States on the tour which he is now making through the country in defense of the league of nations and the ratification of the pending treaty with Germany. I ask that there be placed above them the heading, "Speeches Made by the President in Defense of the League of Nations and the Ratification of the Treaty of Peace up to September 6."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if these are authorized versions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no question about their accuracy?

Mr. WILLIAMS. None that I know of. They are not the newspaper reports, if that is what the Senator means.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECHES MADE BY THE PRESIDENT IN DEFENSE OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY OF PEACE UP TO SEPTEMBER 6.

THE PRESIDENT AT COLUMBUS, OHIO, SEPTEMBER 4, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, Gov. Campbell, my fellow citizens, it is with very profound pleasure that I find myself face to face with you. I have for a long time chafed at the confinement of Washington. I have for a long time wished to fulfill the purposes with which my heart was full when I returned to our beloved country, namely, to go out and report to my fellow countrymen concerning those affairs of the world which now need to be settled. The only people I owe any report to are to you and the other citizens of the United States.

"And it has become increasingly necessary apparently that I should report to you. After all the various angles at which you have heard the treaty held up, perhaps you would like to know what is in the treaty. I find it very difficult in reading some of the speeches that I have read to form any conception of that great document. It is a document unique in the history of the world for many reasons, and I think I can not do you a better service or the peace of the world a better service than by pointing out to you just what this treaty contains and what it seeks to do.

"In the first place, my fellow countrymen, it seeks to punish one of the greatest wrongs ever done in history, the wrong which Germany sought to do to the world and to civilization. And there ought to be no weak purpose with regard to the application of the punishment. She attempted an intolerable thing, and she must be made to pay for the attempt. The terms of the treaty are severe, but they are not unjust. I can testify that the men associated with me in the peace conference in Paris had it in their hearts to do justice and not wrong. But they knew, perhaps with a more vivid sense of what had happened than we could possibly know on this side of the water, the many solemn covenants which Germany had disregarded, the long preparation she had made to overwhelm her neighbors, the utter disregard which she had shown for human rights, for the rights of women, of children, and of those who were helpless. They had seen their lands devastated by an enemy that devoted himself not only to the effort at victory but to the effort at terror, seeking to terrify the people whom he fought. And I wish to testify that they exercised restraint in the terms of this treaty. They did not wish to overwhelm any great nation. They acknowledged that Germany was a great nation, and they had no purpose of overwhelming the German people, but they did think that it ough to be burned into the consciousness of men forever that no people ought to permit its government to do what the German Government did.

"In the last analysis, my fellow countrymen, as we in America would be the first to claim, a people are responsible for the acts of their government. If their government purposes things that are wrong, they ought to take measures to see to it that that purpose is not executed. Germany was self-governed; her rulers had not concealed the purposes that they had in miad, but they had deceived their people as to the character of the methods they were going to use, and I believe, from what I can learn, that there is an awakened consciousness in Germany itself of the deep iniquity of the thing that was attempted. When the Austrian delegates came before the peace conference they, in so many words, spoke of the origination of the war as a crime and admitted in our presence that it was a thing intolerable to contemplate. They knew in their hearts that it had done them the deepest conceivable wrong, that it had put their people and the people of Germany at the judgment seat of mankind, and throughout this treaty every term that was applied to Germany was meant not to humiliate Germany, but to rectify the wrong that she had done.

"Look even into the severe terms of reparation, for there was no indemnity. No indemnity of any sort was claimed, merely reparation, merely paying for the destruction done, merely making good the losses so far as such losses could be made good which she had unjustly inflicted, not upon the Governments, for the reparation is not to go to the Governments, but upon the people whose rights she had trodden upon with absolute absence of everything that even resembled pity. There was no indemnity in this treaty, but there is reparation, and even in the terms of reparation a method is devised by which the reparation shall be adjusted to Germany's ability to pay it.

"I am astonished at some of the statements I hear made about this treaty, and the truth is that they are made by persons who have not read the treaty or who, if they have read it, have not comprehended its meaning. There is a method of adjustment in that treaty by which the reparation shall not be pressed beyond the point which Germany can pay, but which will be pressed to the utmost point that Germany can pay, which is just, which is righteous. It would have been intolerable if there had been anything else. For, my fellow citizens, this treaty is not meant merely to end this single war. It is meant as a notice to every Government who in the future will attempt this thing that mankind will unite to inflict the same punishment. There is no national triumph sought to be recorded in this treaty. There is no glory sought for any particular nation. The thought of the statesmen collected around that table was of their people, of the sufferings that they had gone through, of the losses they had incurred—that great throbbing heart which was so depressed, so forlorn, so sad in every memory that it had had of the five tragical years that have gone by. Let us never forget those years, my fellow countrymen. Let us never forget the purpose, the high purpose, the disinterested purpose, with which America lent its strength, not for its own glory but for the defense of mankind.

"As I said, this treaty was not intended merely to end this war. It was intended to prevent any similar war. I wonder if some of the opponents of the league of nations have forgotten the promises we made our people before we went to that peace table. We had taken by processes of law the flower of our youth from every countryside, from every household, and we told those mothers and fathers and sisters and wives and sweethearts that we were taking those men to fight a war which would end business of that sort; and if we do not end it, if we do not do the best that human concert of action can do to end it, we are of all men the most unfaithful, the most unfaithful to the loving hearts who suffered in this war, the most unfaithful to those households bowed in grief and yet lifted with the feeling that the lad laid down his life for a great thing and, among other things, in order that other lads might never have to do the same thing. That is what the league of nations is for—to end this war justly and then not merely to serve notice on Governments which would contemplate the same things that Germany contemplated that they will do it at their peril, but also concerning the combination of power which will prove to them that they will do it at their peril. It is idle to say the world will combine against you, because it may not, but it is persuasive to say the world is combined against you and will remain combined against the things that Germany attempted. The league of nations is the only thing that can prevent the recurrence of this dreadful catastrophe and redeem our promises.

"The character of the league is based upon the experience of this very war. I did not meet a single public man who did not admit these things, that Germany would not have gone into this war if she had thought Great Britain was going into it, and that she most certainly would never have gone into this war if she dreamed America was going into it. And they all admitted that a notice beforehand that the greatest powers of the world would combine to prevent this sort of thing would prevent it absolutely. When gentlemen tell you, therefore, that the league of nations is intended for some other purpose than this, merely reply this to them: 'If we do not do this thing, we have neglected the central covenant that we made to our people, and there will be no statesman of any country who can thereafter promise his people alleviation from the perils of war.' The passions of this world are not dead. The rivalries of this world have not cooled. They have been rendered hotter than ever. The harness that is to unite nations is more necessary now than it ever was before, and unless there is this assurance of combined action before wrong is attempted, wrong will be attempted just so soon as the most ambitious nations can recover from the financial stress of this war.

"Now, look what else is in the treaty. This treaty is unique in the history of mankind, because the center of it is the redemption of weak nations. There never was a congress of nations before that considered the rights of those who could not enforce their rights. There never was a congress of nations before that did not seek to effect some balance of power brought about by means of serving the strength and interest of the strongest powers concerned; whereas, this treaty builds up nations that never could have won their freedom in any other way, builds them up by gift, by largess, not by obligations; builds them up because of the conviction of the men who wrote the treaty that the rights of people transcend the rights of governments, because of the conviction of the men who wrote that treaty that the fertile source of war is wrong. The Austro-Hungarian Empire, for example, was held together by military force, and consisted of peoples who did not want to live together, who did not have the spirit of nationality as toward each other, who were constantly chafing at the bands that held them. Hungary, though a willing partner of Austria, was willing to be a partner because she could share Austria's strength to accomplish her own ambitions, and her own ambitions were to hold under her the Jugo-Slavic peoples that lay to the south of her; Bohemia, an unhappy partner, a partner by duress, beating in all her veins the strongest national impulse that was to be found anywhere in Europe; and north of that, pitiful Poland, a great nation divided up among the great powers of Europe, torn asunder, kinship disregarded, natural ties treated with contempt, and an obligatory division among sovereigns imposed upon her—a part of her given to Russia, a part of her given to Austria, a part of her given to Germany—great bodies of Polish people never permitted to have the normal intercourse with their kinsmen for fear that fine instinct of the heart should assert itself which binds families together. Poland could never have won her independence. Bohemia never could have broken away from the Austro-Hungarian combination. The Slavic peoples to the south, running down into the great Balkan Peninsula, had again and again tried to assert their nationality and independence and had as often been crushed, not by the immediate power they were fighting but by the combined power of Europe. The old alliances, the old balances of power, were meant to see to it that no little nation asserted its right to the disturbance of the peace of Europe, and every time an assertion of rights was attempted they were suppressed by combined influence and force.

"This treaty tears away all that; says these people have a right to live their own lives under the governments which they themselves choose to set up. That is the American principle, and I was glad to fight for it. And when strategic considerations were urged it was matter of common counsel that such considerations were not in our thought. We were not now arranging for future wars. We were giving people what belonged to them. My fellow citizens, I do not think there is any man alive who has a more tender sympathy for the great people of Italy than I have, and a very stern duty was presented to us when we had to consider some of the claims of Italy on the Adriatic, because strategically, from the point of view of future wars, Italy needed a military foothold on the other side of the Adriatic, but her people did not live there, except in little spots. It was a Slavic people, and I had to say to my Italian friends, 'Everywhere else in this treaty we have given territory to the people who lived on it, and I do not think that it is for the advantage of Italy, and I am sure it is not for the advantage of the world, to give Italy territory where other people live.' I felt the force of the argument for what they wanted, and it was the old argument that had always prevailed, namely, that they needed it from a military point of view, and I have no doubt that if there is no league of nations they will need it from a military point of view; but if there is a league of nations, they will not need it from a military point of view.

"If there is no league of nations, the military point of view will prevail in every instance, and peace will be brought into contempt; but if there is a league of nations, Italy need not fear the fact that the shores on the other side of the Adriatic tower above her lower and sandy shores on her side of the sea, because there will be no threatening guns there, and the nations of the world will have concerted not merely to see that the Slavic peoples have their rights, but that the Italian people have their rights as well. I had rather have everybody on my side than be armed to the teeth. Every settlement that is right, every settlement that is based on the principles I have alluded to, is a safe settlement, because the sympathy of mankind will be behind it.

"Some gentlemen have feared with regard to the league of nations that we will be obliged to do things we do not want to do. If the treaty were wrong, that might be so; but if the treaty is right, we will wish to preserve right. I think I know the heart of this great people, whom I for the time being have the high honor to represent, better than some other men that I hear talk. I have been bred, and am proud to have been bred, in the old Revolutionary school which set this Government up, when America was set up as the friend of mankind, and I know, if they do not, that America has never lost that vision or that purpose. But I have not the slightest fear that arms will be necessary if the purpose is there. If I know that my adversary is armed and I am not, I do not press the controversy; and if any nation entertains selfish purposes set against the principles established in this treaty and is told by the rest of the world that it must withdraw its claims, it will not press them.

"The heart of this treaty, then, my fellow citizens, is not even that it punishes Germany. That is a temporary thing. It is that it rectifies the age-long wrongs which characterized the history of Europe. There were some of us who wished that the scope of the treaty would reach some other age-long wrongs. It was a big job, and I do not say that we wished that it were bigger; but there were other wrongs elsewhere than in Europe, and of the same kind, which no doubt ought to be righted and some day will be righted, but which we could not draw into the treaty, because we could deal only with the countries whom the war had engulfed and affected. But, so far as the scope of our authority went, we rectified the wrongs which have been the fertile source of war in Europe.

"Have you ever reflected, my fellow countrymen, on the real source of revolution? Men do not start revolutions in a sudden passion. Do you remember what Thomas Carlyle said about the French Revolution? He was speaking of the so-called hundred days' terror, which reigned not only in Paris but throughout France, in the days of the French Revolution, and he reminded his readers that back of that hundred days of terror lay several hundred years of agony and of wrong. The French people had been deeply and consistently wronged by their Government, robbed, their human rights disregarded, and the slow agony of those hundreds of years had after a while gathered into a hot anger that could not be suppressed. Revolutions do not spring up overnight. Revolutions come from the long suppression of the human spirit. Revolutions come because men know that they have rights and that they are disregarded, and when we think of the future of the world in connection with this treaty we must remember that one of the chief efforts of those who made this treaty was to remove that anger from the heart of great peoples, great peoples who had always been suppressed and who had always been used, and who had always been the tools in the hands of governments, generally alien governments, not their own. The makers of the treaty knew that if these wrongs were not removed there could be no peace in the world, because, after all, my fellow citizens, war comes from the seed of wrong and not from the seed of right. This treaty is an attempt to right the history of Europe, and, in my humble judgment it is a measurable success. I say 'measurable,' my fellow citizens, because you will realize the difficulty of this. Here are two neighboring peoples. The one people have not stopped at a sharp line and the settlements of the other people or their migrations have not begun at a sharp line. They have intermingled. There were regions where you can not draw a national line and say there are Slavs on this side [illustrating] and Italians on that [illustrating]. It can not be done. You have to approximate the line. You have to come as near to it as you can and then trust to the processes of history to redistribute, it may be, the people that are on the wrong side of the line. There are many such lines drawn in this treaty and to be drawn in the Austrian treaty, where there are, perhaps, more lines of that sort than in the German treaty. When we came to draw the line between the Polish people and the German people, not the line between Germany and Poland—there was no Poland, strictly speaking—but the line between the German and the Polish people, there were districts, like the eastern part of Silesia, which is called Upper Silesia, because it is mountainous and the other part is not. High Silesia is chiefly Polish, and when we came to draw the line of what should be Poland it was necessary to include high Silesia if we were really going to play fair and make Poland up of the Polish peoples wherever we found them in sufficiently close neighborhood to one another, but it was not perfectly clear that high Silesia wanted to be part of Poland. At any rate, there were Germans in high Silesia who said that it did not, and therefore we did there what we did in many other places. We said, 'Very well, then, we will let the people that live there decide. We will have a referendum. Within a certain length of time after the war, under the supervision of an international commission which will have a sufficient armed force behind it to preserve order and see that nobody interferes with the elections, we will have an absolutely free vote, and high Silesia shall go either to Germany or to Poland, as the people in high Silesia prefer.' And that illustrates many other cases where we provided for a referendum, or a plebiscite, as they chose to call it, and are going to leave it to the people themselves, as we should have done, what Government they shall live under. It is none of my prerogative to allot peoples to this Government or the other. It is nobody's right to do that allotting, except the people themselves, and I want to testify that this treaty is shot through with the American principle of the choice of the governed.

"Of course, at times it went further than we could make a practical policy of, because various peoples were keen upon getting back portions of their population which were separated from them by many miles of territory, and we could not spot the map over with little pieces of separated States. I reminded my Italian colleagues that if they were going to claim every place where there was a large Italian population, we would have to cede New York to them, because there are more Italians in New York than in any Italian city. But I believe—I hope—that the Italians in New York City are as glad to stay there as we are to have them. And I would not have you suppose that I am intimating that my Italian colleagues entered any claim for New York City.

"We, of all peoples in the world, my fellow-citizens, ought to be able to understand the questions of this treaty without anybody explaining them to us, for we are made up out of all the peoples of the world. I dare say that in this audience there are representatives of practically all the people dealt with in this treaty. You do not have to have me explain national ambitions to you, national aspirations. You have been brought up on them. You have learned of them since you were children, and it is those national aspirations which we sought to release and give an outlet to in this great treaty. But we did much more than that. This treaty contains among other things a Magna Charta of labor—a thing unheard of until this interesting year of grace. There is a whole section of the treaty devoted to arrangements by which the interests of those who labor with their hands all over the world, whether they be men or women or children, are sought to be safeguarded; and next month there is to meet the first assembly under this section of the league. Let me tell you, it will meet whether the treaty is ratified by that time or not. There is to meet an assembly which represents the interests of laboring men throughout the world, not their political interests; there is nothing political about it. It is the interests of men concerning the conditions of their labor, concerning the character of labor which women shall engage in, the character of labor which children shall be permitted to engage in, the hours of labor, and, incidentally, of course, the remuneration of labor; that labor shall be remunerated in proportion, of course, to the maintenance of the standard of living, which is proper for the man who is expected to give his whole brain and intelligence and energy to a particular task.

"I hear very little said about this Magna Charta of labor which is embodied in this treaty. It forecasts the day which ought to have come long ago, when statesmen will realize that no nation is fortunate which is not happy, and that no nation can be happy whose people are not contented; contented in their lives and fortunate in the circumstances of their lives. If I were to state what seems to me the central idea of this treaty, it would be this: It is almost a discovery in international conventions, that nations do not consist of their governments but consist of their people. That is a rudimentary idea. It seems to us in America to go without saying, but, my fellow-citizens, it was never the leading idea in any other international congress that I ever heard of, that is to say, any international congress made up of the representatives of Governments. They were always thinking of national policy, of national advantage, of the rivalries of trade, of the advantages of territorial conquest. There is nothing of that in this treaty, and you will notice that even the territorities which are taken away from Germany, like her colonies, are not given to anybody. There is not a single act of annexation in this treaty. Territories inhabited by people not yet able to govern themselves, either because of economical or other circumstances, or the stage of their development, are put under the care of powers, who are to act as trustees—trustees responsible in the forum of the world at the bar of the league of nations, and the terms upon which they are to exercise their trusteeship are outlined. They are not to use those people by way of draft to fight their wars for them. They are not to permit any form of slavery among them, or of enforced labor. They are to see to it that there are humane conditions of labor with regard, not only to the women and children, but to the men too. They are to establish no fortifications. They are to regulate the liquor and the opium traffic. They are to see to it, in other words, that the lives of the people whose care they assume—not sovereignty over whom they assume—are kept clean and safe and wholesome. There again the principle of the treaty comes out, that the object of the arrangement is the welfare of the people who live there, and not the advantage of the trustee.

"It goes beyond that. It seeks to gather under the common supervision of the league of nations the various instrumentalities by which the world has been trying to check the evils that were in some places debasing men, like the opium traffic, like the traffic—for it was a traffic—in women and children, like the traffic in other dangerous drugs, like the traffic in arms among uncivilized people who could use arms only for their own detriment. It provides for sanitation, for the work of the Red Cross. Why, those clauses, my fellow citizens, draw the hearts of the world into league, draw the noble impulses of the world together and make a team of them.

"I used to be told that this was an age in which mind was monarch, and my comment was that if that was true the mind was one of those modern monarchs that reigns and does not govern, and that as a matter of fact we were governed by a great representative assembly made up of the human passions, and that the best we could manage was that the high and fine passions should be in a majority, so that they could control the baser passions, so that they could check the things that were wrong. This treaty seeks something like that. In drawing the human endeavors of the world together, it makes a league of the fine passions of the world, of its philanthropic passions, of its passion of pity, of its passion of human sympathy, of its passion of human friendliness and helpfulness, for there is such a passion; it is the passion which has lifted us along the slow road of civilization. It is the passion which has made ordered government possible. It is the passion which has made justice and established it in the world.

"That is the treaty. Did you ever hear of it before? Did you ever know before what was in this treaty? Did anybody before ever tell you what the treaty was intended to do? I beg, my fellow citizens, that you and the rest of those Americans with whom we are happy to be associated all over this broad land will read the treaty yourselves, or, if you will not take the time to do that—for it is a technical document—that you will accept the interpretation of those who made it and know what the intentions were in the making of it. I hear a great deal, my fellow citizens, about the selfishness and the selfish ambitions of other governments, but I would not be doing justice to the gifted men with whom I was associated on the other side of the water if I did not testify that the purposes that I have outlined were their purposes. We differed as to the method very often. We had discussions as to the details, but we never had any serious discussion as to the principle, and while we all acknowledged that the principles might perhaps in detail have been better realized, we are all back of those principles. There is a concert of mind and of purpose and of policy in the world that was never in existence before. I am not saying that by way of credit to myself or to those colleagues to whom I have alluded, because what happened to us was that we got messages from our people. We were under instructions, whether they were written down or not, and we did not dare come home without fulfilling those instructions. If I could not have brought back the kind of treaty that I brought back, I never would have come back, because I would have been an unfaithful servant, and you would have had the right to condemn me in any way that you chose to use. So that I testify that this is an American treaty not only, but it is a treaty that expresses the heart of the great peoples who were associated together in the war against Germany.

"I said at the opening of this informal address, my fellow citizens, that I had come to make a report to you. I want to add to that a little bit. I have not come to debate the treaty. It speaks for itself, if you will let it. The arguments directed against it are directed against it with a radical misunderstanding of the instrument itself. Therefore, I am not going anywhere to debate the treaty. I am going to expound it, and I am going, as I do here now to-day, to urge you in every vocal method that you can use to assert the spirit of the American people in support of it. Do not let men pull it down. Do not let them misrepresent it. Do not let them lead this Nation away from the high purposes with which this war was inaugurated and fought. As I came through that line of youngsters in khaki a few minutes ago, I felt that I could salute them, because I had done the job in the way I promised them I would do it, and when this treaty is accepted men in khaki will not have to cross the seas again. That is the reason I believe in it.

"I say when it is accepted, for it will be accepted. I have never entertained a moment's doubt of that, and the only thing I have been impatient of has been the delay. It is not dangerous delay except for the temper of the peoples scattered throughout the world who are waiting. Do you realize, my fellow citizens, that the whole world is waiting on America? The only country in the world that is trusted at this moment is the United States, and they are waiting to see whether their trust is justified or not. That has been the ground of my impatience. I knew their trust was justified, but I begrudged the time that certain gentlemen wish to take in telling them so. We shall tell them so in a voice as authentic as any voice in history, and in the years to come men will be glad to remember that they had some part in the great struggle which brought this incomparable consummation of the hopes of mankind."

THE PRESIDENT, FROM REAR PLATFORM, RICHMOND, IND., SEPTEMBER 4, 1919.

"I am trying to tell the people what is in the treaty. You would not know what was in it to read some of the speeches I read, and if you will be generous enough to me to read some of the things I say, I hope it will help to clarify a great many matters which have been very much obscured by some of the things which have been said. Because, really, we have now to make the most critical choice we ever made as a Nation, and it ought to be made in all soberness and without the slightest tinge of party feeling in it. I would be ashamed of myself if I discussed this great matter as a Democrat and not as an American. I am sure that every man who looks at it without party prejudice and as an American will find in that treaty more things that are genuinely American than were ever put into any similar document before.

"The chief thing to notice about it, my fellow citizens, is that it is the first treaty ever made by great powers that was not made in their own favor. It is made for the protection of the weak peoples of the world and not for the aggrandizement of the strong. That is a noble achievement, and it is largely due to the influence of such great peoples as the people of America, who hold at their heart this principle that nobody has the right to impose sovereignty upon anybody else; that in disposing of the affairs of a nation that nation or people must be its own master and make its own choice. The extraordinary achievement of this treaty is that it gives a free choice to people who never could have won it for themselves. It is for the first time in the history of international transactions an act of systematic justice and not an act of grabbing and seizing.

"If you will just regard that as the heart of the treaty, for it is the heart of the treaty, then everything else about it is put in a different light. If we want to stand by that principle, then we can justify the history of America as we can in no other way, for that is the history and principle of America. That is the heart of it. I beg that whenever you consider this great matter you will look at it from this point of view: Shall we or shall we not sustain the first great act of international justice? The thing wears a very big aspect when you look at it that way, and all little matters seem to fall away and one seems ashamed to bring in special interests, particularly party interests. What difference does party make when mankind is involved? Parties are intended, if they are intended for any legitimate purpose, to serve mankind, and they are based upon legitimate differences of opinion, not as to whether mankind shall be served or not, but as to the way in which it shall be served; and so far as those differences are legitimate differences they justify the differences between parties."

THE PRESIDENT AT COLISEUM, INDIANAPOLIS, IND., SEPTEMBER 4, 1919.

"Gov. Goodrich, my fellow citizens, so great a company as this tempts me to make a speech, and yet I want to say to you in all seriousness and soberness that I have not come here to make a speech in the ordinary sense of that term. I have come upon a very sober errand, indeed. I have come to report to you upon the work which the representatives of the United States attempted to do at the conference of peace on the other side of the sea, because, my fellow citizens, I realize that my colleagues and I in the task we attempted over there were your servants. We went there upon a distinct errand, which it was our duty to perform in the spirit which you had displayed in the prosecution of the war and in conserving the purposes and objects of that war.

"I was in the city of Columbus this forenoon. I was endeavoring to explain to a body of our fellow citizens there just what it was that the treaty of peace contained, for I must frankly admit that in most of the speeches that I have heard in debate upon the treaty of peace it would be impossible to form a definite conception of what that instrument means. I want to recall to you for the purposes of this evening the circumstances of the war and the purposes for which our men spent their lives on the other side of the sea. You will remember that a prince of the House of Austria was slain in one of the cities of Serbia. Serbia was one of the little kingdoms of Europe. She had no strength which any of the great powers needed to fear, and as we see the war now, Germany and those who conspired with her made a pretext of that assassination in order to make unconscionable demands of the weak and helpless Kingdom of Serbia. Not with a view to bringing about an acquiescense in those demands, but with a view to bringing about a conflict in which other purposes quite separate from the purposes connected with these demands could be achieved. Just so soon as these demands were made on Serbia the other Governments of Europe sent telegraphic messages to Berlin and Vienna asking that the matter be brought into conference, and the significant circumstance of the beginning of this war is that the Austrian and German Governments did not dare to discuss the demands of Serbia or the purposes which they had in view. It is universally admitted on the other side of the water that if they had ever gone into international conference on the Austrian demands the war never would have been begun. There was an insistent demand from London, for example, by the British foreign minister that the cabinets of Europe should be allowed time to confer with the Governments at Vienna and Berlin, and the Governments at Vienna and Berlin did not dare to admit time for discussion.

"I am recalling those circumstances, my fellow citizens, because I want to point out to you what apparently has escaped the attention of some of the critics of the league of nations, that the heart of the league of nations covenant does not lie in any of the portions which have been discussed in public debate. The great bulk of the provisions of that covenant contain these engagements and promises on the part of the States which undertake to become members of it. That in no circumstances will they go to war without first having done one or other of two things, without first having either submitted the question to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the results, or having submitted the question to discussion by the council of the league of nations, in which case they will allow six months for the discussion and engage not to go to war until three months after the council has announced its opinion upon the subject under dispute. So that the heart of the covenant of the league is that the nations solemnly covenant not to go to war for nine months after a controversy becomes acute.

"If there had been nine days of discussion, Germany would not have gone to war. If there had been nine days upon which to bring to bear the opinion of the world, the judgment of mankind upon the purposes of those Governments, they never would have dared to execute those purposes. So that what it is important for us to remember is that when we sent those boys in khaki across the sea we promised them, we promised the world, that we would not conclude this conflict with a mere treaty of peace. We entered into solemn engagements with all the nations with whom we associated ourselves that we would bring about such a kind of settlement and such a concert of the purpose of nations that wars like this could not occur again. If this war has to be fought over again, then all our high ideals and purposes have been disappointed, for we did not go into this war merely to beat Germany. We went into this war to beat all purposes such as Germany entertained.

"You will remember how the conscience of mankind was shocked by what Germany did; not merely by the circumstance to which I have already adverted, that unconscionable demands were made upon a little nation which could not resist, but that immediately upon the beginning of the war the solemn engagements of treaty were cast on one side, and the chief representative of the Imperial Government of Germany said that when national purposes were under consideration treaties were mere scraps of paper; and immediately upon that declaration the German armies invaded the territories of Belgium which they had engaged should be inviolate, invaded those territories with the half avowed purpose that Belgium was necessary to be permanently retained by Germany in order that she should have the proper frontage on the sea and the proper advantage in her contest with the other nations of the world. So that the act which was characteristic of the beginning of this war was the violation of the territorial integrity of the Kingdom of Belgium. We are presently, my fellow countrymen, to have the very great pleasure of welcoming on this side of the sea the King and the Queen of the Belgians, and I for one am perfectly sure that we are going to make it clear to them that we have not forgotten the violation of Belgium; that we have not forgotten the intolerable wrongs which were put upon that suffering people. I have seen their devasted country. Where it was not actually laid in ruins, every factory was gutted of its contents. All the machinery by which it would be possible for men to go to work again was taken away, and those parts of the machinery that they could not take away were destroyed by experts who knew how to destroy them. Belgium was a very successful competitor of Germany in some lines of manufacture, and the German armies went there to see to it that that competition was put a stop to. Their purpose was to crush the independent action of that little Kingdom, not merely to use it as a gateway through which to attack France; and when they got into France, they not only fought the armies of France, but they put the coal mines of France out of commission, so that it will be a decade or more before France can supply herself with coal from her accustomed sources.

"You have heard a great deal about article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations. Article 10 speaks the conscience of the world. Article 10 is the article which goes to the heart of this whole bad business, for that article says that the members of this league, that is intended to be all the great nations of the world, engage to respect and to preserve against all external aggression the territorial integrity and political independence of the nations concerned. That promise is necessary in order to prevent this sort of war from recurring, and we are absolutely discredited if we fought this war and then neglect the essential safeguard against it. You have heard it said, my fellow citizens, that we are robbed of some degree of our sovereign independent choice by articles of that sort. Every man who makes a choice to respect the rights of his neighbors deprives himself of absolute sovereignty, but he does it by promising never to do wrong, and I can not for one see anything that robs me of any inherent right that I ought to retain when I promise that I will do right, when I promise that I will respect the thing which, being disregarded and violated, brought on a war in which millions of men lost their lives, in which the civilization of mankind was in the balance, in which there was the most outrageous exhibition ever witnessed in the history of mankind of the rapacity and disregard for right of a great armed people. We engage in the first sentence of article 10 to respect and preserve from external aggression the territorial integrity and the existing political independence not only of the other member States, but of all States, and if any member of the league of nations disregards that promise, then what happens? The council of the league advises what should be done to enforce the respect for that covenant on the part of the nation attempting to violate it, and there is no compulsion upon us to take that advice except the compulsion of our good conscience and judgment. So that it is perfectly evident that if in the judgment of the people of the United States the council adjudged wrong and that this was not a case of the use of force, there would be no necessity on the part of the Congress of the United States to vote the use of force. But there could be no advice of the council on any such subject without a unanimous vote, and the unanimous vote includes our own, and if we accepted the advice we would be accepting our own advice, for I need not tell you that the representatives of the Government of the United States would not vote without instrutions from their Government at home, and that what we united in advising we could be certain that the American people would desire to do. There is in that covenant not only not a surrender of the independent judgment of the Government of the United States, but an expression of it, because that independent judgment would have to join with the judgment of the rest.

"But when is that judgment going to be expressed, my fellow citizens? Only after it is evident that every other resource has failed, and I want to call your attention to the central machinery of the league of nations. If any member of that league or any nation not a member refuses to submit the question at issue either to arbitration or to discussion by the council, there ensues automatically, by the engagements of this covenant, an absolute economic boycott. There will be no trade with that nation by any member of the league. There will be no interchange of communication by post or telegraph. There will be no travel to or from that nation. Its borders will be closed. No citizen of any other State will be allowed to enter it and no one of its citizens will be allowed to leave it. It will be hermetically sealed by the united action of the most powerful nations in the world. And if this economic boycott bears with unequal weight, the members of the league agree to support one another and to relieve one another in any exceptional disadvantages that may arise out of it.

"I want you to realize that this war was won not only by the armies of the world. It was won by economic means as well. Without the economic means the war would have been much longer continued. What happened was that Germany was shut off from the economic resources of the rest of the globe and she could not stand it. A nation that is boycotted is a nation that is in sight of surrender. Apply this economic, peaceful, silent, deadly remedy and there will be no need for force. It is a terrible remedy. It does not cost a life outside the nation boycotted, but it brings a pressure upon that nation which, in my judgment, no modern nation could resist. I dare say that some of these ideas are new to you, because while it is true, as I said this forenoon in Columbus, that apparently nobody has taken the pains to see what is in this treaty, very few have taken the pains to see what is in the covenant of the league of nations. They have discussed 3, chiefly 3, out of 26 articles, and the other articles contain this heart of the matter, that instead of war there shall be arbitration, instead of war there shall be discussion, instead of war there shall be the closure of intercourse, instead of war there shall be the irresistible pressure of the opinion of mankind. If I had done wrong, I would a great deal rather a man would shoot at me than stand me up for the judgment of my fellow men. I would a great deal rather see the muzzle of a gun than the look in their eyes. I would a great deal rather be put out of the world than live in the world boycotted and deserted. The most terrible thing is outlawry. The most formidable thing is to be absolutely isolated. And that is the kernel of this engagement. War is on the outskirts. War is a remote and secondary threat. War is a last resort. Nobody in his senses claims for the covenant of the league of nations that it is certain to stop war, but I confidently assert that it makes war violently improbable, and that even if we can not guarantee that it will stop war, we are bound in conscience to do our utmost in order to avoid it and prevent it. I was pointing out, my fellow citizens, this forenoon that this covenant is part of a great document. I wish I had brought a copy with me to show you its bulk. It is an enormous volume, and most of the things you hear talked about in that treaty are not the essential things. This is the first treaty in the history of civilization in which great powers have associated themselves together in order to protect the weak. I need not tell you that I speak with knowledge in this matter, knowledge of the purpose of the men with whom the American delegates were associated at the peace table. They came there, everyone that I consulted with, with the same idea that wars had arisen in the past because the strong took advantage of the weak, and that the only way to stop wars was to bind ourselves together to protect the weak; that the example of this war was the example which gave us the finger which pointed to the way of escape, that as Austria and Germany had tried to put upon Serbia, so we must see to it that Serbia and the Slavic peoples associated with her, and the peoples of Roumania and the peoples of Bohemia and the peoples of Hungary and Austria, for that matter, should feel assured in the future that the strength of the great powers was behind their liberty and their independence, and was not intended to be used and never should be used for aggression against them.

"So when you read the covenant, read the treaty with it. I have no doubt that in this audience there are many men which come from that ancient stock of Poland, for example, men in whose blood there is the warmth of old affections connected with that betrayed and ruined country, men whose memories run back to insufferable wrongs suffered by those they love in that country, and I call them to witness that Poland never could have won unity and independence for herself, and those gentlemen sitting at Paris presented Poland with a unity which she could not have won and an independence which she can not defend unless the world guarantees it to her. There is one of the most noble chapters in the history of the world, that this war was concluded in order to remedy the wrongs which had bitten so deep into the experience of the weaker peoples of that great continent. The object of the war was to see to it that there was no more of that sort of wrong done. Now, when you have that picture in your mind, that this treaty was meant to protect those who could not protect themselves, turn the picture and look at it this way.

"Those very weak nations are situated through the very tract of country, between Germany and Persia, which Germany had meant to conquer and dominate, and if the nations of the world do not maintain their concert to sustain the independence and freedom of those peoples, Germany will yet have her will upon them, and we shall witness the very interesting spectacle of having spent millions upon millions of American treasure and, what is much more precious, hundreds of thousands of American lives, to do a futile thing, to do a thing which we will then leave to be undone at the leisure of those who are masters of intrigue, at the leisure of those who are masters in combining wrong influences to overcome right influences, of those who are the masters of the very things that we hate and mean always to fight; for, my fellow citizens, if Germany should ever attempt that again, whether we are in the league of nations or not, we will join to prevent it. We do not stand off and see murder done. We do not profess to be the champions of liberty and then consent to see liberty destroyed. We are not the friends and advocates of free government and then willing to stand by and see free government die before our eyes. For if a power such as Germany was, but thank God no longer is, were to do this thing upon the fields of Europe, then America would have to look to it that she did not do them also upon the fields of the Western Hemisphere, and we should at last be face to face with a power which at the outset we could have crushed, and which now it is within our choice to keep within the harness of civilization.

"I am discussing this thing with you, my fellow citizens, as if I had any doubt of what the verdict of the American people would be. I have not the slightest doubt. I just wanted to have the pleasure of pointing out to you how absolutely ignorant of the treaty and of the covenant some of the men are who have been opposing them. If they do read the English language, they do not understand the English language as I understand it. If they have really read this treaty and this covenant, they only amaze me by their inability to understand what is plainly expressed. So that my errand upon this journey is not to argue these matters, but to recall you to the real issues which are involved. And one of the things that I have most at heart in this report to my fellow citizens is that they should forget what party I belong to and what party they belong to. I am making this journey as a democrat, but I am spelling it with a little "d," and I do not want anybody to remember, so far as this errand is concerned, that it is ever spelt with a big "D." I am making this journey as an American and as a champion of rights which America believes in, and I need not tell you that as compared with the importance of America the importance of the Democratic Party and the importance of the Republican Party and the importance of every other party is absolutely negligible. Parties, my fellow citizens, are intended to embody in action different policies of government. They are not when properly used intended to traverse the principles which underlie government, and the principles which underlie the Government of the United States have been familiar to us ever since we were children. You have been bred, I have no doubt, as I have been bred in the revolutionary school of American thought. I mean that school of American thought which takes its inspiration from the days of the American Revolution. There were only 3,000,000 of us then, but we were ready to stand out against the world for liberty. There are more than a hundred million of us now, and we are ready to insist that everywhere men shall be champions of liberty.

"I want you to notice another interesting point that is never dilated upon in connection with the league of nations. I am treading now upon delicate ground, and I must express myself with caution. There were a good many delegations that visited Paris who wanted to be heard by the peace conference who had real causes to present which ought to be presented to the view of the world, but we had to point out to them that they did not happen, unfortunately, to come within the area of settlement; that their questions were not questions which were necessarily drawn into the things that we were deciding. We were sitting there with the pieces of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in our hands. It had fallen apart. It never was naturally cohesive. We were sitting there with various disbursed assets of the German Empire in our hands, and with regard to every one of them we had to determine what we were going to do with them, but we did not have our own disbursed assets in our hands. We did not have the assets of the nations which constituted the body of nations associated against Germany to dispose of, and therefore we had often, with whatever regret, to turn away from questions that ought some day to be discussed and settled, and upon which the opinion of the world ought to be brought to bear.

"Therefore, I want to call your attention, if you will turn it up when you go home, to article 11, following article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations. That article, let me say, is the favorite article in the treaty, so far as I am concerned. It says that every matter which is likely to affect the peace of the world is everybody's business; that it shall be the friendly right of any nation to call attention in the league to anything that is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations, upon which the peace of the world depends, whether that matter immediately concerns the nation drawing attention to it or not. In other words, at present we have to mind our own business. Under the covenant of the league of nations we can mind other people's business, and anything that affects the peace of the world, whether we are parties to it or not, can by our delegates be brought to the attention of mankind. We can force a nation on the other side of the globe to bring to that bar of mankind any wrong that is afoot in that part of the world which is likely to affect good understanding between nations, and we can oblige them to show cause why it should not be remedied. There is not an oppressed people in the world which can not henceforth get a hearing at that forum, and you know, my fellow citizens, what a hearing will mean if the cause of those people is just. The one thing that those who are doing injustice have most reason to dread is publicity and discussion, because if you are challenged to give a reason why you are doing a wrong thing, it has to be an exceedingly good reason, and if you give a bad reason you confess judgment, and the opinion of mankind goes against you. At present what is the state of international law and understanding? No nation has the right to call attention to anything that does not directly affect its own affairs. If it does, it can not only be told to mind its own business but it risks the cordial relationship between itself and the nation whose affairs it draws under discussion; whereas under article 11 the very sensible provision is made that the peace of the world transcends all the susceptibilities of nations and governments, and that they are obliged to consent to discuss and explain anything which does affect the understanding between nations.

"Not only that, but there is another thing in this covenant which cures one of the principal difficulties we encountered at Paris. I need not tell you that at every turn in those discussions we came across some secret treaty, some understanding that had never been made public before, some understanding which embarrassed the whole settlement. I think it will not be improper for me to refer to one of them. When we came to the settlement of the Shantung matter with regard to China we found that Great Britain and France were under explicit treaty obligation to Japan that she should get exactly what she got in the treaty with Germany, and the most that the United States could do was to urge upon the representatives of Japan the policy which was involved in such a settlement and obtain from her the promise which she gave, that she would not take advantage of those portions of the treaty, but would return without qualification the sovereignty which Germany had enjoyed in Shantung Province to the Republic of China. We have had repeated assurances since then that Japan means to fulfill those promises in absolute good faith. But my present point is that there stood at the very gate of that settlement a secret treaty between Japan and two of the great powers engaged in this war on our side. We could not ask them to disregard those promises. This war had been fought in part because of the refusal to observe the fidelity which is involved in a promise, because of the failure to regard the sacredness of treaties, and this covenant of the league of nations provides that no secret treaty shall have any validity. It provides in explicit terms that every treaty, every international understanding, shall be registered with the secretary of the league; that it shall be published as soon as possible after it is there registered; and that no treaty that is not there registered will be regarded by any of the nations engaged in the covenant. So that we not only have the right to discuss anything, but we make everything open for discussion. If this covenant accomplished little more than the abolition of private arrangements between great powers, it would have gone far toward stabilizing the peace of the world and securing justice, which it has been so difficult to secure so long as nations could come to secret understandings with one another.

"When you look at the covenant of the league of nations thus, in the large, you wonder why it is a bogey to anybody. You wonder what influences have made gentlemen afraid of it. You wonder why it is not obvious to everybody, as it is to those who study it with disinterested thought, that this is the central and essential covenant of the whole peace. As I was saying this forenoon, I can come through a double row of men in khaki and acknowledge their salute with a free heart, because I kept my promise to them. I told them when they went to this war that it was a war not only to beat Germany but to prevent any subsequent wars of this kind. I can look all the mothers of this country in the face and all the sisters and the wives and the sweethearts and say, 'The boys will not have to do this again.' You would think to hear some of the men who discuss this covenant that it is an arrangement for sending our men abroad again just as soon as possible. It is the only conceivable arrangement which will prevent our sending our men abroad again very soon, and, if I may use a very common expression, I would say if it is not to be this arrangement, what arrangement do you suggest to secure the peace of the world? It is a case of 'put up or shut up.' Opposition is not going to save the world. Negations are not going to construct the policies of mankind. A great plan is the only thing that can defeat a great plan. The only triumphant ideas in this world are the ideas that are organized for battle. The only thing that wins against a program is a better program. If this is not the way to secure peace, I beg that the way will be pointed out. If we must reject this way, then I beg that before I am sent to ask Germany to make a new kind of peace with us I should be given specific instructions what kind of peace it is to be. If the gentlemen who do not like what was done at Paris think they can do something better, I beg that they will hold their convention soon and do it now. They can not in conscience or good faith deprive us of this great work of peace without substituting some other that is better.

"So, my fellow citizens, I look forward with profound gratifications to the time, which I believe will now not much longer be delayed, when the American people can say to their fellows in all parts of the world, 'We are the friends of liberty; we have joined with the rest of mankind in securing the guaranties of liberty; we stand here with you the eternal champions of what is right, and may God keep us in the covenant that we have formed.'"

THE PRESIDENT AT LUNCHEON AT HOTEL STATLER, ST. LOUIS, MO., SEPTEMBER 5, 1919.

"Mr. Johnson, your honor Mr. Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen, it is with great pleasure that I find myself in St. Louis again, because I have always found it possible in St. Louis to discuss serious questions in a way that gets mind in contact with mind, instead of that other very less desirable thing, passion in contact with passion. I am glad to hear the mayor say, and I believe that it is true, that politics is adjourned. Party politics has no place, my fellow citizens, in the subject we are now obliged to discuss and to decide. Politics in the wider sense has a great deal to do with them. The politics of the world, the policy of mankind, the concert of the methods by which the world is to be bettered, that concert of will and of action which will make every nation a nobler instrument of Divine Providence—that is world politics.

"I have sometimes heard gentlemen discussing the questions that are now before us with a distinction drawn between nationalism and internationalism in these matters. It is very difficult for me to follow their distinction. The greatest nationalist is the man who wants his nation to be the greatest nation, and the greatest nation is the nation which penetrates to the heart of its duty and mission among the nations of the world. With every flash of insight into the great politics of mankind the nation that has that vision is elevated to a place of influence and power which it can not get by arms, which it can not get by commercial rivalry, which it can get by no other way than by that spiritual leadership which comes from a profound understanding of the problems of humanity. It is in the light of ideas of this sort that I conceive it a privilege to discuss the matters that I have come away from Washington to discuss.

"I have come away from Washington to discuss them because apparently it is difficult to discuss them in Washington. The whole subject is surrounded with a mist which it is difficult to penetrate. I brought home with me from the other side of the water a great document, a great human document, but after you hear it talked about in Washington for a while you think that it has just about three or four clauses in it. You fancy that it has a certain article 10 in it, that it has something about Shantung in it, that it has something about the Monroe doctrine in it, that it has something about quitting, withdrawing from the league, showing that you do not want to play the game; and I do not hear about anything else in it. Why, my fellow citizens, those are mere details and incidents of a great human enterprise, and I have sought the privilege of telling you what I conceive that human enterprise to be.

"The war that has just been finished was no accident. Any man who had followed the politics of the world up to that critical break must have known that that was the logical outcome of the processes that had preceded it, must have known that the nations of the world were preparing for that very thing and were expecting it. One of the most interesting things that I realized after I got to the other side of the water was that the mental attitude of the French people with regard to the settlement of this war was largely determined by the fact that for nearly 50 years they had expected it, that for nearly 50 years they had dreaded by the exercise of German force the very thing that had happened, and their constant theme was, 'We must devise means by which this intolerable fear will be lifted from our hearts. We can not, we will not, live another 50 years under the cloud of that terror.' The terror had been there all the time and the war was its flame and consummation. And it had been expected, because the politics of Europe were based upon a definite conception. That conception was that the strong had all the rights and that all that the weak could enjoy was what the strong permitted them to enjoy; that no nation had any right that could not be asserted by the exercise of force; and that the real politics of Europe consisted in determining how many of the weak elements in the European combination of families and of nations should be under the influence and control of one set of nations, and how many of those elements should be under the influence and control of another set of nations.

"One of the centers of all the bad business was in that town of Constantinople. I do not suppose that intrigue was ever anywhere else reduced to such a consummate art or practiced with such ardor and subtlety as in Constantinople. That was because Constantinople was the key to the weak part of Europe. That was where the pawns were; not the kings and the queens and the castles and the bishops and the rest of the chess game of politics, but the little pawns. They made the opening for the heavier pieces. Their maneuvers determined the arrangement of the board, and those who controlled the pawns controlled the outcome of the whole effort to checkmate and to match and to capture and to take advantage. The shrewdest politicians in the diplomatic service of the several nations were put at Constantinople to run the game, which consisted in maneuvering the weak for the advantage of the strong, and every international conference that preceded the conference at Paris, which is still in process, has been intended to complete and consummate the arrangements for that game. For the first time in the history of mankind the recent conference at Paris was convened to destroy that system and substitute another. I take it, my fellow-citizens, that when you look at that volume, for it is a thick volume, that contains the treaty of peace with Germany, in the light of what I have been saying to you, you will read it with greater interest than you have hitherto attached to it. It is the chart and constitution of a new system for the world, and that new system is based upon an absolute reversal of the principles of the old system. The central object of that treaty is to establish the independence and protect the integrity of the weak peoples of the world.

"I hear some gentlemen who are themselves incapable of altruistic purposes say, 'Ah, but that is altruistic. It is not our business to take care of the weak nations of the world.' No, but it is our business to prevent war, and if we do not take care of the weak nations of the world there will be war. These gentlemen assume the rôle of being very practical men, and they say, 'We do not want to get into war to protect every little nation in the world.' Very well then, let them show me how they will keep out of war by not protecting them, and let them show me how they will prove that having gone into an enterprise they are not absolute contemptible quitters if they do not see the game through. They joined with the rest of us in the profession of fine purpose when we went into the war, and what was the fine purpose that they professed? It was not merely to defeat Germany. It is not a handsome enterprise for any great nation to go into a war merely to reduce another nation to obedience. They went in and they professed to go in to see to it that nobody after Germany's defeat should repeat the experiment which Germany had tried. And how do they propose to do that? To leave the material that Germany was going to make her dominating empire out of helpless and at her mercy. What was the old formula of Pan-Germanism? From Breman to Bagdad, wasn't it? Well, look at the map. What lies between Bremen and Bagdad? After you get past the German territory, there is Poland. There is Bohemia, which we have made into Czechoslovakia. There is Hungary, which is divided from Austria and does not share Austria's strength. There is Roumania. There is Jugo-Slavia. There is broken Turkey; and then Persia and Bagdad. The route is open. The route is wide open, and we have undertaken to say, 'This route is closed!' If you do not close it, you have no choice but some day or other to enter into exactly the same sort of war that we have just gone through. Those gentlemen are dreaming. They are living in a past age, which is gone and all but forgotten, when they say that we can mind our own business.

"What is our own business? Is there any merchant present here or any manufacturer or any banker that can say that our interests are separate from the interest of the rest of the world commercially, industrially, financially? There is not a man in any one of those professions who does not admit that our industrial fortunes are tied up with the industrial fortunes of the rest of the world. He knows that, and when he draws a picture to himself, if he is frank, of what some gentlemen propose, this is what he sees: America minding her own business and having no other—despised, suspected, distrusted, and on the other side of the water the treaty and its operation—interrupted? Not at all! We are a great Nation, my fellow citizens, but the treaty is going to be applied just the same whether we take part in it or not, and part of its application—at the center of its application—stands that great problem of the rehabilitation of Germany industrially. I say the problem of her rehabilitation, because unless she is rehabilitated she can not pay the reparation, and the reparation commission created by the treaty is created for the purpose of seeing that Germany pays the reparation; and it was admitted in all our conferences that in order to do that steps must be taken to enable Germany to pay the reparation, which means her industrial and commercial rehabilitation. Not only that, but some of you gentlemen know we used to have a trade with Germany. All of that trade is going to be in the hands and under the control of the raparation commission. I humbly asked leave to appoint a member to look after our interests, and I was rebuked for it. I am looking after the industrial interests of the United States. I would like to see the other men who are. They are forgetting the industrial interests of the Untied States, and they are doing things that will cut us off and our trade off from the normal channels, because the reparation commission can determine where Germany buys, what Germany buys, how much Germany buys; the reparation commission can determine in what instruments of credit she temporarily expresses her debt. They can determine how those instruments of credit shall be used for the basis of the credit which must underlie international exchanges. They are going to stand at the center of the financial operations of the world. Now, is it minding our business to keep out of that? On the contrary, it is handing our business over to people who are not particularly interested in seeing that it prospers. These are facts which I can appropriately address to a chamber of commerce because they are facts which nobody can controvert and which yet seem often to be forgotten. The broad aspects of this subject are seldom brought to your attention. It is the little picayune details here and there.

"Now, that brings me, my fellow citizens, to the guaranty of this whole thing. We said that we were going to fight this war for the purpose of seeing to it that the mothers and sisters and fathers of this land, and the sweethearts and wives, did not have to send their lads over on the other side of the sea to fight any more, and so we took part in an arrangement by which justice was to be secured throughout the world. The rest of the world, partly at our suggestion, said 'Yes,' and said it gladly; said 'Yes; we will go into the partnership to see that justice is maintained,' and then I come home and hear some gentlemen say, 'But will we?' Are we interested in justice? The treaty of peace, as I have just said to you, is based upon the protection of the weak against the strong, and there is only one force that can protect the weak against the strong, and that is the universal concert of the strength of mankind. That is the league of nations.

"But I beg that you will not conceive of the league of nations as a combination of the world for war, for that is exactly what it is not. It is a combination of the world for arbitration and discussion. I was taking the pains the other day to make a sort of table of contents of the covenant of the league of nations, and I found that practically the whole heart of it, that two-thirds of its provisions were devoted to setting up a system of arbitration and discussion in the world. Why, these are the facts, my fellow citizens. The members of the league agree that no one of them will ever go to war about anything without first doing one or other of two things—without either submitting the question to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the decision of the arbitrators absolutely, or submitting it to discussion by the council of the league of nations, in which case they agree that no matter what the opinion expressed by the council may be they will allow six months for the discussion, and whether they are satisfied with the conclusion or not will not go to war in less than three months after the rendering of the opinion. I think we can take it for granted that the preliminaries would take two or three months, in which case you have a whole year of discussion, even when you do not get arbitration, and I want to call you to witness that in almost every international controversy which has been submitted to thorough canvass by the opinion of the world it has become impossible for the result to be war. War is a process of heat. Exposure is a process of cooling, and what is proposed in this is that every hot thing shall be spread out in the cooling air of the opinion of the world, and, after it is thoroughly cooled off, then let the nations concerned determine whether they are going to fight about it or not.

"And notice the sanction. Any member of the league which breaks these promises with regard to arbitration or discussion is to be deemed thereby to have committed an act of war against the other members of the league; not merely to have done an immoral thing but, by refusing to obey those processes, to have committed an act of war and put itself out of court. And you know what then happens. You say, 'Yes; we form an army and go and fight them.' Not at all. We shut their doors and lock them in. We boycott them. Just so soon as that is done they can not ship cargoes out or receive them shipped in. They can not send a telegraphic message. They can not send or receive a letter. Nobody can leave their territory and nobody can enter their territory. They are absolutely boycotted by the rest of mankind. I do not think that after that remedy it will be necessary to do any fighting at all. What brought Germany to her knees was not only the splendid fighting of the incomparable men who met her armies, but it was that her doors were locked and she could not get supplies from any part of the world. There were a few doors open, doors to some Swedish ore, for example, that she needed for making munitions, and that kept her going for a time; but the Swedish door would be shut this time. There would not be any door open, and that brings a nation to its senses just as suffocation removes from the individual all inclination to fight.

"Now, that is the league of nations, an agreement to arbitrate or discuss, and an agreement that if you do not arbitrate or discuss, you shall be absolutely boycotted and starved out. There is hardly a European nation, my fellow citizens, that is of a fighting inclination that has enough food to eat without importing food, and it will be a very persuasive argument that it has nothing to eat, because you can not fight on an empty stomach any more than you can worship God on an empty stomach. When we add to that some other very interesting particulars, I think the league of nations becomes a very interesting thing indeed. You have heard of article 10—and I am going to speak about that in a minute—but read article 11, because really there are other articles in the covenant. Article 11 says—I am not quoting its language, but its substance—that anything that is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding upon which the peace of the world depends shall be everybody's business; that any nation, the littlest nation at the table, can stand up and challenge the right of the strongest nation there to keep on in a course of action or policy which is likely to disturb the peace of the world, and that it shall be its 'friendly right' to do so. Those are the words. It can not be regarded as a hostile or unfriendly act. It is its friendly right to do that, and if you will not give the secret away, I wrote those words myself, because, with the usual inclination of a talkative man I did not want there to be anything in the world that I could not talk about, and yet I did not want to give offense. I wanted it to be our friendly right and everybody's friendly right to discuss everything that was likely to affect the peace of the world, because that is everybody's business, and it is everybody's business to see that nothing happens that does disturb the peace of the world.

"And there is added to this particular this very interesting thing: There can hereafter be no secret treaties. There were nations represented around that board—I mean the board at which the commission on the league of nations sat, where 14 nations were represented—there were nations represented around that board who had entered into many a secret treaty and understanding, and they made not the least objection to promising that hereafter no secret treaty should have any validity whatever. The provision of the covenant is that every treaty or international understanding shall be registered, I believe the word is, with the general secretary of the league, that the general secretary shall publish it in full just so soon as it is possible for him to publish it, and that no treaty shall be valid which is not thus registered. It is like our arrangements with regard to mortgages on real estate, that until they are registered nobody else need pay any attention to them. And so with the treaties; until they are registered in this office of the league nobody, not even the parties themselves, can insist upon their execution. You have cleared the deck thereby of the most dangerous thing and the most embarrassing thing that has hitherto existed in international politics. It was very embarrassing, my fellow citizens, when you thought you were approaching an ideal solution of a particular question to find that some of your principal colleagues had given the whole thing away. And that leads me to speak just in passing of what has given a great many people natural distress. I mean the Shantung settlement, the settlement with regard to a portion of the Province of Shantung in China.

"Great Britain and France, as everybody now knows, in order to make it more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should, in the case of the victory of the Allies, pass to Japan. There was no qualification in the promise. She was to get exactly what Germany had, and so the only thing that was possible was to induce Japan to promise—and I want to say in fairness, for it would not be fair if I did not say it, that Japan did very handsomely make the promise which was requested of her—that she would retain in Shantung none of the sovereign rights which Germany had enjoyed there, but would return the sovereignty without qualification to China and retain in Shantung Province only what other nationalities had already had elsewhere, economic rights with regard to the development and administration of the railway and of certain mines which had become attached to the railway. That is her promise, and personally I have not the slightest doubt that she will fulfill that promise. She can not fulfill it right now because the thing does not go into operation until three months after the treaty is ratified, so that we must not be too impatient about it. But she will fulfill those promises. Suppose that we said that we would not assent. England and France must assent, and if we are going to get Shantung Province back for China and these gentlemen do not want to engage in foreign wars, how are they going to get it back? Their idea of not getting into trouble seems to be to stand for the largest possible number of unworkable propositions. It is all very well to talk about standing by China, but how are you standing by China when you withdraw from the only arrangement by which China can be assisted? If you are China's friend, then do not go into the council where you can act as China's friend! If you are China's friend, then put her in a position where even the concessions which have been made need not be carried out! If you are China's friend, scuttle and run! That is not the kind of American I am.

"Now, just a word about article 10. Permit me, if you will, to recur to what I said at the opening of these somewhat disjointed remarks. I said that the treaty was intended to destroy one system and substitute another. That other system was based upon the principle that no strong power need respect the territorial integrity or the political independence of any weak power. I need not confine the phraseology to that. It was based upon the principle that no power is obliged to respect the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other power if it has the force necessary to disregard it. So that article 10 cuts at the very heart and is the only instrument that will cut to the very heart of the old system. Remember that if this covenant is adopted by the number of nations which it probably will be adopted by, it means every nation except Germany and Turkey, because we have already said we would let Austria come in—Germany has to undergo a certain period of probation to see whether she has really experienced a change of heart and effected a genuine change of constitutional provision—all the nations of the world except one strong one and one negligible one agree that they will respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other nations of the world.

"You would think from some of the discussions that the emphasis is on the word 'preserve.' We are partners with the rest of the world in respecting the territorial integrity and political independence of others. They are all under solemn bonds themselves to respect and to preserve those things, and if they do not preserve them, if they do not respect them or preserve them, what happens? The council of the league then advises the several members of the league what it is necessary to do. I can testify from having sat at the board where the instrument was drawn that advice means advice. I supposed it did before I returned home, but I found some gentlemen doubted it. Advice means advice, and the advice can not be given without the concurrent vote of the representative of the United States. Ah, but somebody says, 'Suppose we are a party to the quarrel!' I can not suppose that, because I know that the United States is not going to disregard the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other nation; but for the sake of the argument suppose that we are party. Very well, then, the scrap is ours anyway. For what these gentlemen are afraid of is that we are going to get into trouble. If we are a party, we are in trouble already, and if we are not a party we can control the advice of the council by our own vote. To my mind that is a little like an open and shut game, and I am not afraid of advice which we give ourselves. And yet that is the whole of the bugaboo which these gentlemen have been parading before you. The solemn thing about article 10 is the first sentence, not the second sentence. The first sentence says that we will respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of other nations; and let me stop a moment on the words 'external aggression.' Why were they put in? Because every man who sat at that board held that the right of revolution was sacred and must not be interfered with. Any kind of a row can happen inside and it is nobody's right to interfere. The only thing that there is any right to object to or interfere with is external aggression by some outside power undertaking to take a piece of territory or to interfere with the internal political arrangements of the country which is suffering from the aggression, because territorial integrity does not mean that you can not invade another country; it means that you can not invade it and stay here. I have not impaired the territorial integrity of your backyard if I walk into it, but I very much impair it if I insist upon staying there and will not get out, and the impairment of the integrity contemplated in this article is the kind of integrity which is violated if there is a seizure of territory, if there is an attempted annexation, if there is an attempted continuing domination either of the territory itself or of the methods of government inside that territory. When you read article 10, therefore, you will see that it is nothing but the inevitable, logical center of the whole system of the covenant of the league of nations, and I stand for it absolutely. If it should ever in any important respect be impaired, I would feel like asking the Secretary of War to get the boys who went across the water to fight on some field where I could go and see them, and I would stand up before them and say, 'Boys, I told you before you went across the seas that this was a war against wars, and I did my best to fulfill the promise, but I am obliged to come to you in mortification and shame and say I have not been able to fulfill the promise. You are betrayed. You fought for something that you did not get, and the glory of the Armies and the Navy of the United States is gone like a dream in the night, and there ensues upon it in the suitable darkness of the night the nightmare of dread which lay upon the nations before this war came, and there will come some time in the vengeful Providence of God another struggle in which not a few hundred thousand fine men from America wil have to die but as many millions as are necessary to accomplish the final freedom of the peoples of the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT COLISEUM, ST. LOUIS, MO., SEPTEMBER 5, 1919.

"Mr Chairman, Gov. Gardner, my fellow countrymen, this is much too solemn an occasion to care how we look; we ought to care how we think. [The photographer had just asked the audience to sit still for the picture.] I have come here to-night to ask permission to discuss with you some of the very curious aberrations of thinking that have taken place in this country of late. I have sought—I think I have sought without prejudice—to understand the point of view of the men who have been opposing the treaty and the covenant of the league of nations. Many of them are men whose judgment, whose patriotic feeling, I have been accustomed to admire and respect, and yet I must admit to you, my fellow countrymen, that it is very hard for me to believe that they have followed their line of thinking to its logical and necessary conclusion, because when you reflect upon their position, it is either that we ought to reject this treaty altogether or that we ought to change it in such a way as will make it necessary to reopen negotiations with Germany and reconsider the settlements of the peace in many essential particulars. We can not do the latter alone, and other nations will not join us in doing it. The only alternative is to reject the peace and to do what some of our fellow countrymen have been advising us to do—stand alone in the world.

"I am going to take the liberty to-night of pointing out to you what this alternative means. I know the course of reasoning which is either uttered or implicit in this advice when it is given us by some of the men who propose this course. They believe that the United States is so strong, so financially strong, so industrially strong, if necessary so physically strong, that it can impose its will upon the world, if it is necessary for it to stand out against the world, and they believe that the processes of peace can be processes of domination and antagonism instead of processes of cooperation and good feeling. I therefore want to point out to you that only those who are ignorant of the world can believe that any nation, even so great a nation as the United States, can stand alone and play a single part in the history of mankind.

"Begin with a single circumstance, for I have not come here to-night to indulge in any kind of oratory. I have come here to-night to present to you certain hard facts which I want you to take home with you and think about. I suppose that most of you realize that it is going to be very difficult for the other nations that were engaged in this war to get financially on their feet again. I dare say you read the other day the statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover's opinion—an opinion which I always greatly respect—that it will be necessary for the United States immediately to advance four or five billion dollars for the rehabilitation of credit and industry on the other side of the water; and I must say to you that I learned nothing in Paris which would lead me to doubt that conclusion, and I think the statement of the sum is a reasonable and conservative statement.

"If the world is going bankrupt, if credit is going to be destroyed, if the industry of the rest of the world is going to be interrupted, our market is confined to the United States. Trade will be impossible, except within our own borders. If we are to save our own markets and rehabilitate our own industries, we must save the financial situation of the world and rehabilitate the markets of the world. Very well, what do these gentlemen propose? That we should do that, for we can not escape doing it. Face to face with a situation of this kind, we are not, let us assume, partners in the execution of this treaty. What is one of the central features of the execution of this treaty? It is the application of the reparation clauses. Germany can not pay for this war unless her industries are revived, and the treaty of peace sets up a great commission known as the 'reparation commission,' in which it was intended that there should be a member from the United States as well as from other countries, and the business of this commission will be in part to see that the industries of Germany are revived, in order that Germany may pay this great debt which she owes to civilization. That reparation commission can determine the currents of trade, the conditions of international credit; it can determine how much Germany is going to buy, where it is going to buy, how it is going to pay for it; and if we must, to save ourselves, contribute to the financial rehabilitation of the world then, without being members of this partnership, we must put our money in the hands of those who want to get the markets that belong to us. That is what these gentlemen call playing a lone hand. It is indeed playing a lone hand. It is playing a hand that is frozen out. We must contribute the money which other nations are to use in order to rehabilitate their industry and credit, and we must make them our antagonists and rivals and not our partners. I put that proposition to any business man, young or old, in the United States and ask him how he likes it and whether he considers that a useful way for the United States to stand alone. We have got to carry this burden of reconstruction whether we will or not or be ruined, and the question is, Shall we carry it and be ruined anyhow? For that is what these gentlemen propose—that at every point we shall be embarrassed by the whole financial affairs of the world being in the hands of other nations.

"As I was saying at the luncheon that I had the pleasure of eating with the chamber of commerce to-day, the whole aspect of the matter is an aspect of ignorance. The men who propose these things do not understand the selfish interests of the United States, because here is the rest of the picture: Hot rivalries; burning suspicions; jealousies; arrangements made everywhere, if possible, to shut us out, because if we will not come in as equals we ought to be shut out. If we are going to keep out of this thing in order to prey upon the rest of the world, then I think we ought to be frozen out of it. That is not the temper of the United States, and it is not like the United States to be ignorant enough to think any such thoughts, because we know that partners profit and enemies lose the game. But that is not all of the picture, my fellow citizens. If every nation is going to be our rival, if every nation is going to dislike and distrust us—and that will be the case, because having trusted us beyond measure, the reaction will occur beyond measure—as it stands now they trust us, they look to us, they long that we shall undertake anything for their assistance rather than that any other nations should undertake it—if we say no, we are in this world to live by ourselves and get what we can out of it by any selfish processes—then the reaction will change the whole heart and attitude of the world toward this great, free, justice-loving people, and after you have changed the attitude of the world what have you produced? Peace? Why, my fellow citizens, is there any man here or any women—let me say is there any child here—who does not know that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry? The real reason that the war that we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her, and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they thought Germany would get the commercial advantage of them. The seed of the jealousy, the seed of the deep-seated hatred, was hot successful commercial and industrial rivalry.

"Why, what did the Germans do when they got into Belgium? I have just seen that suffering country. Most of the Belgian factories are standing. You do not witness in Belgium what you witness in France, except upon certain battle fields—factories destroyed, whole towns wiped out. No; the factories are there, the streets are clear, the people are there; but go in the factories. Every piece of machinery that could be taken away has been taken away. If it was too big to take away, experts directed the way in which it should be injured so it could never be used again; and that was because there were textural industries and iron industries in Belgium which the Germans hated Belgium for having, because they were better than the German and outdid them in the markets of the world. This war was a commercial and industrial war. It was not a political war.

"Very well, then, if we must stand apart and be the hostile rivals of the rest of the world, then we must do something else. We must be physically ready for anything that comes. We must have a great standing Army. We must see to it that every man in America is trained to arms. We must see to it that there are munitions and guns enough for an Army that means a mobilized Nation; that they are not only laid up in store but that they are kept up to date; that they are ready to use to-morrow; that we are a Nation in arms. Because you can not be unfriendly to everybody without being ready that everybody shall be unfriendly to you. And what does that mean? Reduction of taxes? No. Not only the continuation of the present taxes but the increase of the present taxes; and it means something very much more serious than that. We can stand that, so far as the expense is concerned, if we care to keep up the high cost of living and enjoy the other luxuries that we have recently enjoyed; but what is much more serious than that, we have got to have the sort of organization which is the only kind of organization that can handle armies of that sort. We may say what we please of the German Government that has been destroyed, my fellow citizens, but it was the only sort of government that could handle an armed nation. You can not handle an armed nation by vote. You can not handle an armed nation if it is democratic, because democracies do not go to war that way. You have got to have a concentrated militaristic organization of government to run a nation of that sort. You have got to think of the President of the United States not as the chief counsellor of the Nation, elected for a little while, but as the man meant constantly and every day to be the commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, ready to order them to any part of the world where the threat of war is a menace to his own people. And you can not do that under free debate. You can not do that under public counsel. Plans must be kept secret. Knowledge must be accumulated by a system which we have condemned, because we have called it a spying system. The more polite call it a system of intelligence. You can not watch other nations with your unassisted eye. You have got to watch them by secret agencies, planted everywhere. Let me testify to this, my fellow citizens: I not only did not know it until we got into this war but I did not believe it when I was told that it was true that Germany was not the only country that maintained a secret service. Every country in Europe maintained it, because they had to be ready for Germany's spring upon them, and the only difference between the German secret service and the other secret services was that the German secret service found out more than the others did, and therefore Germany sprang upon the other nations unawares and they were not ready for it.

"And you know what the effect of a military nation is upon social questions. You know how impossible it is to effect social reform if everybody must be under orders from the Government. You know how impossible it is, in short, to have a free nation if it is a military nation and under military order. You may say, 'You have been on the other side of the water and got bad dreams.' I have got no dreams at all. I am telling you the things, the evidence of which I have seen with awakened eyes, and not with sleeping eyes, and I know that this country if it wishes to stand alone must stand alone as part of a world in arms. Because, ladies and gentlemen, I do not say it because I am an American and my heart is full of the same pride that fills yours with regard to the power and spirit of this great Nation, but merely because it is a fact which I think everybody would admit outside of America as well as inside of America—the organization contemplated by the league of nations without the United States would merely be an alliance and not a league of nations. It would be an alliance in which the partnership would be between the more powerful European nations and Japan, and the other party to the world arrangement, the antagonist, the disassociated party, the party standing off to be watched by the alliance, would be the United States of America. There can be no league of nations in the true sense without the partnership of this great people.

"Now, let us mix the selfish with the unselfish. If you do not want me to be too altruistic, let me be very practical. If we are partners, let me predict we will be the senior partner. The financial leadership will be ours. The industrial primacy will be ours. The commercial advantage will be ours. The other countries of the world will look to us, do I say?—are looking to us for leadership and direction. Very well, then, if I am to compete with the critics of this league and of this treaty as a selfish American, I say I want to get in and get in as quick as I can. I want to be inside and know how the thing is run and help to run it. So that you have the alternative, armed isolation or peaceful partnership. Can any sane man hesitate as to the choice, and can any sane man ask the question which is the way of peace? I have heard some men say with an amazing ignorance that the covenant of the league of nations was an arrangement for war. Very well, then, the other arrangement—what would it be? An arrangement for peace? For kindliness? For cooperation? Would everybody beckon us to their markets? Would everybody say, Come and tell us how to use your money? Would everybody come and say, Tell us how much of your goods you want us to take; tell us how much of what Germany is producing you would like when we want it? I can not bring my credulity up to that point. I have reached years of discretion, and I have met some very young men who knew a great deal more than some very old men.

"I want you, therefore, after seeing this very ugly picture that I have painted, for it is an ugly picture, it is a picture from which one turns away with distaste and disgust and says, That is not America, it is not like anything that we have ever conceived—I want you to look at the other side. I wonder if some of the gentlemen who are commenting upon this treaty ever read it? If anybody will tell me which of them has not, I will send him a copy. It is written in two languages. On this side is the English and on that side is the French, and since it is evident that some men do not understand English, I hope that they understand French. There are excellent French dictionaries by which they can dig out the meaning if they can not understand English. It is the plainest English that you should desire, particularly the covenent of the league of nations. There is not a phrase of doubtful meaning in the whole document.

"And what is the meaning? It is that the covenant of the league of nations is a covenant of arbitration and discussion. Had anybody ever told you that before? I dare say that everybody you have heard talk about this discusses article 10. Well, there are 25 other articles in it, and all of them are about something else. They discuss how soon and how quick we can get out of it. Well, I am not a quitter for one. We can get out just so soon as we want to, but we do not want to get out as soon as we get in. And they talk about the Monroe doctrine, when it expressly says that nothing in that document shall be construed as affecting in any way the validity of the Monroe doctrine. It says so in so many words. And there are all the other things they talk about to draw your attention away from the essential matter. The essential matter, my fellow citizens, is this: Every member of that league—and it will include all the fighting nations of the world except Germany; the only nations that will not be admitted into it promptly are Germany and Turkey—we can, at any rate, postpone Turkey until Thanksgiving—all the fighting nations of the world are in it, and what do they promise? This is the center of the document. They promise that they never will go to war without first either submitting the question at issue to arbitration and absolutely abiding by the decision of the arbitrators, or, if they are not willing to submit it to arbitration, they will submit it to discussion by the council of the league, that they will give the council of the league six months in which to consider it, and that if they do not like the opinion of the council they will wait three months after the opinion is rendered before going to war. And I tell you, my fellow citizens, that any nation that is in the wrong and waits nine months before it goes to war never will go to war.

"Ah, but somebody says, Suppose they do not abide by that? Because all the arguments you hear are based upon the assumption that we are all going to break the covenant, that bad faith is the accepted rule. There has not been any such bad faith among nations in recent times except the flagrant bad faith of the nation we have just been fighting, and that bad faith is not likely to be repeated in the immediate future. Suppose somebody does not abide by those engagements, then what happens? War? No; not war. Something more terrible than war—absolute boycott of the nation in question. The doors are closed upon her, so that she can not ship anything out or receive anything in. She can not send a letter out or receive one in. No telegraphic message can cross her borders. No person can cross her borders. She is absolutely closed, and all the fighting nations of the world agree to join in the boycott. My own judgment is that war will not be necessary after that. If it is necessary, then it is perfectly evident that the case is one of a nation that wants to run amuck, and if any nation wants to run amuck in modern civilization we must all see that the outlaw is captured.

"I was saying in one of the first speeches I made upon this little expedition of mine that I was very happy in the circumstance that there were no politics in this business. I meant no party politics, and I invited that audience, as I invite you, to forget all about parties; forget that I am a Democrat; forget that some of you are Republicans; forget all about that. That has nothing to do with it. And this afternoon a book I had forgotten all about, one of the campaign books of the last political campaign, was put in my hands, and I found in that book the platforms of the two parties, and in both of those platforms they advocate just such an arrangement as the league of nations. When I was on the other side of the water I did not know that I was obeying orders from both parties, but I was, and I am very happy in that circumstance, because I can testify to you that I did not think anything about parties when I was on the other side of the water. I am just as much, my fellow citizens, in my present office the servant of my Republican fellow citizens as I am the servant of my Democratic fellow citizens. I am trying to be what some gentlemen do not know how to be—just a simple, plain-thinking, plain-speaking, out-and-out American.

"Now, I want you to understand, my fellow citizens, that I did not leave Washington and come out on this trip because I doubted what was going to happen. I did not. For one thing, I wanted to have the pleasure of leaving Washington; and, for another thing, I wanted to have the very much greater pleasure of feeling the inspiration that I would get from you. Things get very lonely in Washington sometimes. The real voices of the great people of America sometimes sound faint and distant in that strange city. You hear politics until you wish that both parties were smothered in their own gas. And I wanted to come out and hear some plain American, hear the kind of talk that I am accustomed to talk, the only kind of talk that I can understand, get the only kind of atmosphere with which I can fill my lungs wholesomely, and then, incidentally, convey a hint in some quarters that the American people had not forgotten how to think.

"There are certain places where talk does not count for anything. I am inclined to think that one of those places is the fashionable dinner table. I have never heard so many things that were not so anywhere else. In the little circles of fashion and wealth information circulates the more freely the less true it is. For some reason there is a preference for the things that are incredible. I admit there is a certain intellectual excitement in believing the things that are incredible. It is very much duller to believe only the things that you know are so, but the spicy thing, the unusual thing, the thing that runs athwart the normal and wholesome currents of society, that is the thing that one can talk about with an unusual vocabulary and have a lot of fun in expounding. But they are not the things that make up the daily substance of thinking on the part of a wholesome Nation like this.

"This Nation went into this war to see it through to the end, and the end has not come yet. This is the beginning, not of the war, but of the processes which are going to render a war like this impossible. There are no other processes than these that are proposed in this great treaty. It is a great treaty, it is a treaty of justice, of rigorous and severe justice, but do not forget that there are many other parties to this treaty than Germany and her opponents. There is rehabilitated Poland. There is rescued Bohemia, there is redeemed Jugo-Slavia. There is the rehabilitated Roumania. All the nations that Germany meant to crush and reduce to the status of tools in her own hands, have been redeemed by this war and given the guarantee of the strongest nations of the world that nobody shall invade their liberty again. If you do not want to give them that guaranty, then you make it certain that without your guarantee the attempt will be made again, and if another war starts like this one, are you going to keep out of it? If you keep out of this arrangement, that sort of war will come soon. If you go into it, it never will come. We are in the presence, therefore, of the most solemn choice that this people was ever called upon to make. That choice is nothing less than this: Shall America redeem her pledges to the world? America is made up of the peoples of the world. All the best bloods of the world flow in her veins, all the old affections, all the old and sacred traditions of peoples of every sort throughout the wide world circulate in her veins, and she has said to mankind at her birth, 'We have come to redeem the world by giving it liberty and justice.' Now, we are called upon before the tribunal of mankind to redeem that immortal pledge."

THE PRESIDENT AT CONVENTION HALL, KANSAS CITY, MO., SEPTEMBER 6, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, my fellow countrymen, it is very inspiring to me to stand in the presence of so great a company of my fellow citizens and have the privilege of performing the duty that I have come to perform. That duty is to report to my fellow citizens concerning the work of the peace conference. And every day it seems to me to become more necessary to report, because so many people who are talking about it do not understand what it was. I came back from Paris bringing one of the greatest documents of human history, and one of the things that made it great was that it was penetrated throughout with the principles to which America has devoted her life. Let me hasten to say that one of the most delightful circumstances of the work on the other side of the water was that I discovered that what we called American principles had penetrated to the heart and to the understanding, not only of the great peoples of Europe but to the hearts and understandings of the great men who were leading the peoples of Europe, and when these principles were written into this treaty, they were written there by common consent and common conviction, but it remains true nevertheless, my fellow citizens, that principles are written into that treaty which were never written into any great international understanding before, and that they had their natural birth and origin in this dear country to which we have devoted our life and service.

"I have no hesitation in saying that in spirit and essence it is an American document, and if you will bear with me—for this great subject is not a subject for oratory, it is a subject for examination and discussion—if you will bear with me I will remind you of some of the things that we have long desired and which are at last accomplished in this treaty. I think that I can say that one of the things that America has had most at heart throughout her existence has been that there should be substituted for the brutal processes of war the friendly processes of consultation and arbitration, and that is done in the covenant of the league of nations. I am very anxious that my fellow citizens should realize that that is the chief topic of the covenant of the league of nations; and the greater part of those provisions—the whole intent and purpose of the document—are expressed in provisions by which all the member States agree that they will never go to war without first having done one or other of two things, either submitted the matter in controversy to arbitration, in which case they agree to abide by the verdict, or submitted it to discussion in the council of the league of nations, and for that purpose they consent to allow six months for the discussion, and, whether they like the opinion expressed or not, that they will not go to war for three months after that opinion is expressed. So that you have, whether you get arbitration or not, nine months' discussion, and I want to remind you that that is the central principle of some 30 treaties entered into between the United States of America and some 30 other sovereign nations, all of which were confirmed by the Senate of the United States. We have such an agreement with France. We have such an agreement with Great Britain. We have such an agreement with practically every great nation except Germany, which refused to enter into any such arrangement, because, my fellow citizens, Germany knew that she intended something that did not bear discussion, and that if she had submitted the purpose which led to this war to so much as one month's discussion she never would have dared go into the enterprise against mankind which she finally did go into. Therefore I say that this principle of discussion is the principle already adopted by America. And what is the compulsion to do this? The compulsion is this, that if any member State violates that promise to submit either to arbitration or discussion, it is thereby ipso facto deemed to have committed an act of war against all the rest. Then, you will ask, Do we at once take up arms and fight them? No; we do something very much more terrible than that. We absolutely boycott them. It is provided in that instrument that there shall be no communication even between them and the rest of the world; they shall receive no goods; they shall ship no goods. They shall receive no telegraphic messages; they shall send none. They shall receive no mail; no mail will be received from them. The nationals, the citizens, of the member States will never enter their territory until the matter is adjusted, and their citizens can not leave their own territory. The most complete boycott ever conceived in a public document; and I want to say to you with confident prediction that there will be no more fighting after that. Gentlemen talk to you as if the most probable outcome of this great combination of all the fighting peoples of the world was going to be fight, whereas, as a matter of fact, the essence of the document is to the effect that the processes shall be peaceful, and peaceful processes are more deadly than the processes of war. Let any merchant put it to himself, that if he enters into a covenant and then breaks it and the people all around him absolutely desert his establishment and will have nothing to do with him, ask him after that if it will be necessary to send the police. The most terrible thing that can happen to an individual and the most conclusive thing that can happen to a nation is to be read out of decent society.

"And there was another thing that we wished to accomplish that is accomplished in this document. We wanted disarmament, and this document provides in the only possible way for disarmament, by common agreement. Observe, my fellow citizens, that, as I said just now, every great fighting nation in the world is to be a member of this partnership except Germany, and inasmuch as Germany has accepted a limitation of her army to 100,000 men, I do not think for the time being she may be regarded as a great fighting nation. Here in the center of Europe a great nation of more than 60,000,000 that has agreed not to maintain an army of more than 100,000 men, and all around her the rest of the world in concerted partnership to see that no other nation attempts what she attempted, and agreeing among themselves that they will not impose this limitation of armament upon Germany merely, but that they will impose it upon themselves. And you know, my fellow citizens, what armaments mean: Great standing armies and great stores of war material. They do not mean burdensome taxation merely; they do not mean merely compulsory military service which saps the economic strength of the nation, but they mean the building up of a military class. Again and again, my fellow citizens, in the conference at Paris, we were face to face with this circumstance, that in dealing with a particular civil government we found that they would not dare to promise what their general staff was not willing that they should promise, and that they were dominated by the military machine which they had created, nominally for their own defense, but really, whether they willed it or not, for the provocation of war. And so soon as you have a military class, it does not make any difference what your form of government is, if you are determined to be armed to the teeth, you must obey the orders and directions of the only men who can control the great machinery of war. Elections are of minor importance, because they determine the political policy, and back of that political policy is the constant pressure of the men trained to arms, enormous bodies of disciplined men behind them, unlimited supplies of military stores, and wondering if they are never going to be allowed to use their education and their skill and ravage some great people with the force of arms. That is the meaning of armaments. It is not merely the cost of it, though that is overwhelming, but it is the spirit of it, and America has never had, and I hope in the providence of God never will have, that spirit.

"There is no other way to dispense with great armaments except by the common agreement of the fighting nations of the world. And here is the agreement. They promise disarmament, and promise to agree upon a plan.

"But there was something else we wanted that is accomplished by this treaty. We wanted to destroy autocratic authority everywhere in the world. We wanted to see to it that there was no place in the world where a small group of men could use their fellow citizens as pawns in a game, that there was no place in the world where a small group of men without consulting their fellow citizens, could send their fellow citizens to the battle fields and to death in order to accomplish some dynastic ambition, some political plan that had been conceived in private, some object that had been prepared for by universal, world-wide intrigue. That is what we wanted to accomplish. The most startling thing that developed itself at the opening of our participation in this war was, not the military preparation of Germany; we were familiar with that, though we had been dreaming that she would not use it, but her political preparation—to find every community in the civilized world was penetrated by her intrigue. The German people did not know that, but it was known on Wilhelmstrasse, where the central offices of the German Government were, and Wilhelmstrasse was the master of the German people. And this war, my fellow citizens, has emancipated the German people as well as the rest of the world. We do not want to see anything like that happen again, because we know that democracies will sooner or later have to destroy that form of government, and if we do not destroy it now, the job is still to be done. And by a combination of all the great fighting peoples of the world, to see to it that the aggressive purposes of such governments can not be realized, you make it no longer worth while for little groups of men to contrive the downfall of civilization in private conference.

"But I want to say something about that that has a different aspect, and perhaps you will regard it as a slight digression from the discussion which I am asking you to be patient enough to follow. My fellow citizens, it does not make any difference what kind of a minority governs you if it is a minority, and the thing we must see to is that no minority anywhere masters the majority. That is at the heart, my fellow citizens, of the tragical things that are happening in that great country which we long to help and can find no way that is effective to help. I mean the great realm of Russia. The men who are now measurably in control of the affairs of Russia represent nobody but themselves. They have again and again been challenged to call a constitutional convention. They have again and again been challenged to prove that they had some kind of a mandate, even from a single class of their fellow citizens, and they dare not attempt it. They have no mandate from anybody. There are only 34, I am told, and there were more than 34 men who used to control the destinies of Europe from Wilhelmstrasse. There is a closer monopoly of power in Petrograd and Moscow than there ever was in Berlin, and the thing that is intolerable is not that the Russian people are having their way, but that another group of men, more cruel than the Czar himself, is controlling the destinies of that great people. I want to say here and now that I am against the control of any minority anywhere. Search your own economic history and what have you been uneasy about? Now and again you have said there were small groups of capitalists who were controlling the industry and therefore the development of the United States. Very well, my fellow citizens, if that is so, and sometimes I have feared that it was, we must break up that monopoly. I am not now saying that there is any group of our fellow citizens who are consciously doing anything of the kind. I am saying that these allegations must be proved, but if it is proved that any class, any group anywhere, is without the suffrage of their fellow citizens, in control of our affairs, then I am with you to destroy the power of that group. We have got to be frank with ourselves; however, if we do not want minority government in Russia, we must see that we do not have it in the United States. If you do not want little groups of selfish men to plot the future of Europe, we must not allow little groups of selfish men to plot the future of America. Any man that speaks for a class must prove that he also speaks for all his fellow citizens and for mankind, and then we will listen to him. The most difficult thing in a democracy, my fellow citizens, is to get classes where they unfortunately exist to understand one another and unite, and yet you have not got a great democracy until they do understand one another and unite. So that if we are in for seeing that there are no more Czars and no more Kaisers, then let us do a thorough job and see that nothing of that sort occurs anywhere.

"Then there was another thing we wanted to do, my fellow citizens, that is done in this document. We wanted to see that helpless peoples were nowhere in the world put at the mercy of unscrupulous enemies and masters. There is one pitiful example, which is in the hearts of all of us. I mean the example of Armenia. There a Christian people is helpless, at the mercy of a Turkish Government, which thought it the service of God to destroy them. And at this moment, my fellow citizens, it is an open question whether the Armenian people will not, while we sit here and debate, be absolutely destroyed. When I think of words piled on words, of debate following debate, when these unspeakable things that can not be handled until the debate is over are happening in this pitiful part of the world, I wonder that men do not wake up to the moral responsibility of what they are doing. Great populations are driven out upon a desert where there is no food and can be none, and there compelled to die, and the men and women and children thrown into a common grave, so imperfectly covered up that here and there is a pitiful arm stretched out to heaven, and there is no pity in the world. When shall we wake to the moral responsibility of this great occasion?

"So, my fellow citizens, there are other aspects to that matter. Not all the populations that are having something that is not a square deal live in Armenia. There are others, and one of the glories of the great document which I brought back with me is this, that everywhere within the area of settlement covered by the political questions involved in that treaty people of that sort have been given their freedom and guaranteed their freedom. But the thing does not end there, because the treaty includes the covenant of the league of nations, and what does that say? That says that it is the privilege of any member State to call attention to anything anywhere that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends, and every people in the world that have not got what they think they ought to have is thereby given a world forum in which to bring the thing to the bar of mankind. An incomparable thing, a thing that never was dreamed of before! A thing that was never conceived as possible before, that it should not be regarded as an unfriendly act on the part of the representatives of one nation to call attention to something being done within the confines of another empire which was disturbing the peace of the world and the good understanding between nations! * * * And the majestic thing about the league of nations is that it is to include the great peoples of the world, all except Germany. Germany is one of the great peoples of the world. I would be ashamed not to say that. Those 60,000,000 industrious and inventive and accomplished people are one of the great peoples of the world. They have been put upon. They have been misled. Their minds have been debased by a false philosophy. They have been taught things that the human spirit ought to reject, but they will come out of that nightmare, they will come out of that phantasm, and they will again be a great people; and when they are out of it, when they have got over that dream of conquest and of oppression, when they have shown that their Government really is based upon new principles and upon democratic principles, then we all of us at Paris agreed that they should be admitted to the league of nations.

"In the meantime, her one-time partner, Austria, is to be admitted. Hungary, I dare say, will be admitted, and the only nations outside the league—unless we choose to stay out and go in later with Germany—the only nations left out of any consequence are Germany and Turkey. And we are just now looking for the pieces of Turkey. She has so thoroughly disintegrated that the process of assembling the parts is becoming increasingly difficult, and the chief controversy now is who shall attempt that very difficult and perilous job.

"Is it not a great vision, my fellow citizens, this of the thoughtful world combined for peace, this of all the great peoples of the world associated to see that justice is done, that the strong who intend wrong are restrained, and that the weak who can not defend themselves are made secure? We have a problem ahead of us that ought to interest us in this connection. We have promised the people of the Philippine Islands that we will set them free, and it has been one of our perplexities how we should make them safe after we set them free. Under this arrangement it will be safe from the outset. They will become members of the league of nations; every great nation in the world will be pledged to respect and preserve against external aggression from any quarter the territorial integrity and political independence of the Philippines. It simplifies one of the most perplexing problems that has faced the American public, but it does not simplify our problems merely, gentlemen. It illustrates the triumph of the American spirit. I do not want to attempt any flight of fancy, but I can fancy those men of the first generation that so thoughtfully set this great Government up, the generation of Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson and the Adamses. I can fancy their looking on with a sort of enraptured amazement that the American spirit should have made conquest of the world. I wish you could have seen the faces of some of the people that talked to us over there about the arrival of the American troops. At first they did not know that we were going to be able to send so many, but they got something from the first groups that changed the whole aspect of the war. One of the most influential ladies in Paris, the wife of a member of the cabinet, told us that on the Fourth of July of last year she and others had attended the ceremonies with very sad hearts, and merely out of courtesy to the United States, because they did not believe that the aid of the United States was going to be effective; but she said, 'After we had been there and seen the faces of those men in khaki, seen the spirit of their swing and attitude, and seen the vision that was in their eyes, we came away knowing that victory was in sight.' What Europe saw in our boys was not merely men under arms, indomitable men under arms, but men with an ideal in their eyes, men who had come a long way from home to defend other peoples, men who had forgotten the convenience of everything that personally affected them and had turned away from the longing love of the people who were dear to them and had come across the broad sea to rescue the nations of the world from an intolerable oppression.

"I tell you, my fellow citizens, the war was won by the American spirit. Orders were found, were picked up on the battle field, German orders, directing the commanders not to let the Americans get hold of a particular post, because you never could get them out again. And you know what one of our American wits said, that it took only half as long to train an American army as any other, because you only had to train them to go one way. And it is true that they never thought of going any other way, and when they were restrained, because they were told it was premature or dangerous, they were impatient. They said, 'We didn't come over here to wait; we came over here to fight.' And their very audacity, their very indifference to danger, changed the morale of the battle field. They were not fighting prudently; they were going to get there. And America in this treaty has realized, my fellow countrymen, what those gallant boys we are so proud of fought for. The men who make this impossible or difficult will have a lifelong reckoning with the fighting forces of the United States. I have consorted with those boys. I have been proud to call myself their Commander in Chief. I did not run the business. They did not need anybody to run it. All I had to do was to turn them loose.

"And now for a final word, my fellow citizens. If anything that I have said has left the impression on your mind that I have the least doubt of the result, please dismiss the impression. And if you think that I have come out on this errand to fight anybody—any body—please dismiss that from your mind. I have not come to fight or antagonize anybody, or any body of individuals. I have, let me say without the slightest affectation, the greatest respect for the Senate of the United States, but, my fellow citizens, I have come out to fight a cause. That cause is greater than the Senate. It is greater than the Government. It is as great as the cause of mankind, and I intend, in office or out, to fight that battle as long as I live. My ancestors were troublesome Scotchmen, and among them were some of that famous group that were known as Covenanters. Very well, then; here is the covenant of the league of nations. I am a Covenanter!"

FOREIGN ALLIANCES AND INTERFERENCES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to present a letter from Mr. Charles Stewart Davison, a lawyer of New York, in which he has brought together extracts, with the references, from the writings of Jefferson in regard to foreign alliances and interferences in the affairs of Europe. I think it will be very useful as a matter of reference, and I ask that it be printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, September 3, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Not Washington only, but Jefferson as well, drew a sharp distinction between the making of "commercial" and other treaties and the making of "political" alliances between this country and the nations of Europe. Commercial treaties, treaties of amity and friendship, and, when necessary, defensive alliances against aggression they favored. Political conventions both recognized to be foreign to the welfare of the land and fatal to our future.

What Washington said has been often quoted; what Jefferson said has been strangely neglected at this, of all other moments, when it applies so directly. Jefferson for some 40 years spoke and wrote consistently against such conventions being entered into on our part. To quote from his writings:

"I know that it is a maxim with us, and I think it a wise one, not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of Europe." (To E. Carrington (Paris, 1787). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, ii, 334. Ford edition, iv, 483.)

"Better keep together as we are, haul off from Europe as soon as we can and from all attachments to any portions of it." (To John Taylor (Philadelphia, 1798). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 247. Ford edition, vii, 265.)

"I am for free commerce with all nations; political connection with none; and little or no diplomatic establishment. And I am not for linking ourselves by new treaties with the quarrels of Europe." (To Elbridge Gerry (Philadelphia, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 268. Ford edition, vii, 328.

"Commerce with all nations, alliance with none, should be our motto." (To T. Lomax (Monticello, March, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 301. Ford edition, vii, 374.)

"I sincerely join you in abjuring all political connection with every foreign power; and though I cordially wish well to the progress of liberty in all nations and would forever give it the weight of our countenance, yet they are not to be touched without contamination from their other bad principles." (To T. Lomax (Monticello, March, 1799). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 301. Ford edition, vii, 374.)

"Let our affairs be disentangled from those of all other nations, except as to commerce." (To Gideon Granger (Monticello, 1800). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 331. Ford edition, vii, 452.)

"The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe." (Parliamentary Manual, ix, 81. 1800.)

"To take part in European conflicts would be to divert our energies from creation to destruction." (To George Logan (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford edition, vii, 23.)

"It ought to be the very first object of our pursuits to have nothing to do with the European interests and politics. Let them be free or slaves, at will, navigators or agriculturists, swallowed into one government or divided into a thousand; we have nothing to fear from them in any form." (To George Logan (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford edition, viii, 23.)

"Determined as we are to avoid, if possible, wasting the energies of our people in war and destruction, we shall avoid implicating ourselves with the powers of Europe, even in support of principles we mean to pursue. They have so many other interests different from ours that we must avoid being entangled in them. We believe we can enforce these principles as to ourselves by peaceable means, now that we are likely to have our public councils detached from foreign views." (To Thomas Paine (Washington, March, 1801). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 370. Ford edition, viii, 18.)

"Our nation has wisely avoided entangling itself in the system of European interests, has taken no side between its rival powers, attached itself to none of its ever-changing confederacies." (Reply to address of Baltimore Baptists (1808). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, viii, 137.)

"The seed of hatred and revenge which they are now sowing with a large hand will not fail to produce their fruits in time." (To M. de Marbois (Monticello, 1817). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, vii, 76.)

And concerning more particularly a league of nations:

"Treaties of alliance are generally insufficient to enforce compliance with their mutual stipulations." (The Anas (1818), ix, 88. The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford edition, i, 157.)

"It is a theatrical farce, in which the five powers are the actors." (To President Monroe (Monticello, June, 1823). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, vii, 289. Ford edition, x, 258.)

"It is against our system to entangle ourselves at all with the affairs of Europe." (To Philip Mazzei (Washington, 1824). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Washington edition, iv, 553.)

Yet Jefferson, misliked by many then and now as to his idealism, was at least as earnest, at least as well read, at least as experienced, at least as liberal, and at least as competent to judge human tendencies and the results of human action as are any of the idealists of to-day. Nor has human nature, which remained unchanged through the centuries and persistently held its traits through many leagues of nations, altered in the last 100 years. Nor are world conditions to-day different from those of Jefferson's time, which was that of the overthrow of Napoleon, of the bankruptcy of Europe, of the threatened revolution in England, of the disorder and misery of the nations, of the great convulsion of the nineteenth century, and of the founding for the same purposes of a league of nations, known as the Holy Alliance, to secure peace and guarantee the territorial integrity of the associated powers. Of it, to quote him finally, Jefferson says:

"With respect to the European combinations against the rights of man, I join an honest Irishmen of my neighborhood in his Fourth of July toast, 'The Holy Alliance—to hell the whole of them.'" (To Thomas Leiper (Monticello, 1824). The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Ford edition, x, 298.)

Yours, truly,

CHAS. STEWART DAVISON.

VIOLENCE AND STRIKES.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, the other day I read in the Columbia State, a newspaper published in Columbia, S. C., an article on violence and strikes. It is very short and I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD. It expresses my views better than I can express them.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIOLENCE AND STRIKES.

"Any citizen of Charlotte who is indisposed to work as a conductor or motorman on the street car lines has the indisputable right to get out and keep out of that kind of employment. That, however, is no reason why street cars should not be run in Charlotte. If other men wish to work as motormen or conductors, their indisputable right is to do so, and interference with them in any hostile manner by other men is criminal. Conceding that the strikers in Charlotte have not molested or threatened to molest the nonstrikers, it is certain that some men have done so.

"It happens that at this time this country is big enough for every able-bodied man to get some kind of job.

"If the street car company in Charlotte has no right to serve the people, except as employees or former employees would direct, and if that question has to be settled by force and violence, the sooner it is settled the better for all concerned. The public should know 'where it is at.' Resort to violence is as excusable in one strike as another and if it is to be admitted by tacit consent as a legitimate factor in a dispute between employer and employees in one industry it should be and must be eventually admitted in all industries. That means that if half the cooks in Charlotte strike the public and the law officers should stand by while their friends go into the kitchens, where other cooks are employed and are still at work, to entice or frighten them away from the kitchen sinks. It means that if the cotton pickers on a plantation in Sumter County quit work their friends should be allowed to drive the pickers, with staves and stones, from the cotton field adjoining.

"Why does the public not awake? Why does it assume that a certain kind of ruffianism in relation to a strike should be tolerated? Has not the public sense enough to perceive that if it be winked at long enough it will get to be a rule in all industry? Does not the public well know that three-fourths of our industry is agricultural?

"The Charlotte Observer said last Thursday:

"'Conviction has been growing stronger in the minds of both the people and organized labor that the community never could countenance the character of unionism which has been attempted here and which has had violence as its foundation stone. Labor as organized in Charlotte has been freed from all these antagonistic influences and the prospect appears brighter that the mind of labor is being again directed toward the better and more effective principles of persuasion and friendly counsel. Where violence will fail the methods with which the organized labor of this community had so long been identified will win in the end.'

"To the organization of laboring men no one can wisely object. Their right to organization is just as good as is that of the bankers or doctors—and no better. A strike by the bank cashiers would not imply a right by their friends to dynamite the vault when other cashiers had been elected and had gone to work. The public has a right to the security of its money in the bank and to the security of life and limb when riding on a street car. If these things be debatable, now is as good a time as any to debate and settle them. Is civil war the only method by which the right of any and every man to work and carry on business can be settled?

"The majority of the American people want peace and order. Ninety-five per cent want them. There are men enough in the country to perform the country's tasks.

"Why should 5 per cent of the population be allowed to disturb the other 95 per cent?"

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a telegram from the mayor of Abilene, Tex., Hon. Dallas Scarbrough, transmitting resolutions adopted at a recent mass meeting of citizens of Abilene and Taylor County in favor of the league of nations. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABILENE, TEX., September 6, 1919.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD and Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.:

In a mass meeting here the following resolutions were passed:

"We, the citizens of Abilene and Taylor County, Tex., desire to record in the most emphatic terms our deepest disappointment at the attitude of certain Members on the greatly delayed ratification of the treaty of peace, thus cheating the millions of suffering humanity of the world of the early fruits of peace for which they have been crying for 10 long months, for which our gallant sons and millions of our brothers across the seas died, for which the civil population of the nations of the world have made unprecedented sacrices, and for which the duly authorized representatives of the United States, with our own great President Woodrow Wilson, have labored unceasingly through many months. We denounce the attempt to make the treaty or the President a partisan issue as unpatriotic and un-American, and call upon the people of our country everywhere to forthwith lodge their earnest protests with the Senate against any further tactics of partisans or obstructionists. To faithfully keep the covenant with the blood of our gallant heroes and with the millions who suffered with them, the Senate is in honor bound to promptly ratify the treaty and render impossible a recurrence of the awful tragedy of a world war."

DALLAS SCARBROUGH, Mayor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business? [After a pause.] The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, there is a bill on the calendar which I believe should be disposed of one way or the other. It is House bill 8624, known as the food-control bill, Order of Business 73. I believe it should be disposed of, and I think we can do so during the morning hour. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, have we not a rule which requires us to proceed with the calendar on Monday morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. It is enforced once in a while.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope it will be enforced this morning.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. In what position, now, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota, is the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It comes down at 2 o'clock. It would anyway.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDGE. I simply want to take advantage of any moments before 2 o'clock to get the bill on its way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to setting aside Calendar Monday by unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, Mr. President. I object to setting it aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

THE CALENDAR.

The first business on the calendar was the resolution (S. SUBSCRIPTIONS TO UNITED WAR-WORK CAMPAIGN.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 42) authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to the united war-work campaign in the same manner and under the same conditions as they are authorized to contribute to the American National Red Cross by section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross," approved May 22, 1918.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 1726) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if there is an objection to the consideration of this bill, I desire to move its consideration. I hope there will be no objection.

I wish to state to any Senator who thinks this measure ought to be objected to that it is a bill that passed the Senate during the last session. It was one of the bills that was passed at so late a day that it could not reach the House before final adjournment; and the only amendment that has since been made, as we reintroduced the same bill, was to eliminate the names of those who have died since the previous bill passed the Senate. It received the consideration of the Senate Committee on Pensions when the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was chairman of that committee. It is needless to say, therefore, that it had the careful consideration of that committee.

This bill was reported in July. A number of bills have since been reported from the House to be taken up by the Senate; but we have not called a meeting of the Committee on Pensions, because I would not call it to consider those matters until it was definitely determined whether we could put through a bill that has been on the calendar since July 10. I did not understand who objected, but I hope the Senator making the objection will withdraw it under the circumstances.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that if the Senator insists on taking up the bill, regardless of the objection, it will be taken up with but one negative vote on the motion. Still I must object.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1726) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment. It proposes to pension the following persons at the rate named:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY J. DAVIS.

Maize on the regular list of Army officers" and insert "at the foot of the regular list of captains of Cavalry," so as to make the bill read:

DISCOUNT OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

The bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1908, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I shall want to be heard briefly upon that bill, and I think I shall object for the time being. I have not any desire to delay the legislation unnecessarily. I am disposed to think that perhaps some of the restrictions as to the amount that can be loaned should be eliminated. But under this bill as it now is a borrower, by drawing drafts and attaching bills of lading, could borrow every dollar of deposits that a bank has. There is no limitation whatever under the bill. I think I shall ask that the bill may go over. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was very much interested in it on Saturday, and I asked then that it should go over.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist that the bill shall go over. There are reasons why it should be considered now. We do not know when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is coming back. This is a measure of very great importance to certain industries and certain sections. They are beginning to move cotton in the South, as the Senator knows, and it is almost necessary that something be done to take care of that situation, and it ought to be done as soon as possible. The bill passed the House some weeks ago practically unanimously. It was reported out of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House without objection, and I understood there was no objection on the part of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. If the Senator from Ohio thinks some limitation should be placed in it, let us take up the bill and consider it, and let him offer his amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Allow me to make a suggestion in regard to it. I do not feel that the bill should be considered hurriedly. I understand that I would be limited to the five-minute rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. POMERENE. It is impossible to present a matter of this importance in that time. I have not any objection to its being taken up this afternoon, but I want to have it taken up at a time when we will not be limited by the five-minute rule. I understand the bill which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has in charge is the unfinished business. So far as I am concerned, this bill may be taken up immediately after that is disposed of, or if the Senator from New Jersey will give way to this bill, I am quite willing that that shall be done. I think I can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Senate that without any limitation this would be very bad legislation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Mississippi that I had intended to offer some amendments to this bill on page 3 by providing that paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 should be put under the 25 per cent rule. The objection to the bill which the Senator from Ohio so strongly feels is that under paragraph 1 there might be a loan to a single individual, secured by these securities, up to the full capital or even beyond the full capital, without any limitation at all.

Mr. POMERENE. The only limitation would be the deposits of the bank.

Mr. OWEN. They would not be limited by that, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. POMERENE. No; that is true, if they could go out and borrow it and reloan it.

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the bill can be accomplished with these limitations in it, I am sure, without any serious difficulty.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Ohio feel that way about it, it does not appear to me to be very difficult for us to put in an amendment to meet that and let the bill go through.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall object for the time being, but I will aid the Senator in getting it up this afternoon, if that can be done.

Mr. HARRISON. While the Senator from Ohio is on his feet, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey whether it would be agreeable to him this afternoon some time temporarily to lay aside the bill that is now the unfinished business, so that we may take up this little amendment to the Federal reserve act, which I am sure, from what the Senator from Ohio says, and from other expressions I have heard, would not take more than a very few minutes?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I trust I may be able to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi. It depends to a great extent upon the progress of the bill for which I am sponsor. I hope we may be able to dispose of it this afternoon. It will depend entirely, I might say, on the situation this afternoon after we commence to discuss the bill. I will certainly do everything possible to try to meet the desire of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not want to allow one observation to pass unheeded. My good friend the Senator from Mississippi has referred to this as a "little amendment," but it is a mighty amendment. It enables the borrower under those circumstances to get the entire deposits of the bank without any limitation at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EDWARD W. WHITAKER.

The bill (S. 861) for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker was announced as next in order.

Mr. OWEN. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

THE DIXIE HIGHWAY.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) exempting the Dixie Highway from the prohibition contained in the act approved July 11, 1919, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LANDS FOR MILITARY PURPOSES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) to permit the payment for certain lands where requisition of the title thereto was duly served and possession taken thereunder or where a binding agreement was entered into followed by the taking possession thereof and erection of improvements thereon prior to July 11, 1919, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 6, after the word "thereunder," to insert "and substantial buildings erected thereon"; and in line 9, after the word "and," to strike out "erections" and insert "erection"; and in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "improvements" and insert "substantial buildings," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas it is provided by the act of Congress approved July 11, 1919 (Public No. 7, H. R. 5227):

"That no part of any of the appropriations made herein nor any of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the Army or the Military Establishment shall be expended for the purchase of real estate or for the construction of Army camps or cantonments except in such cases at National Army or National Guard camps or cantonments which were in use prior to November 11, 1918, where it has been or may be found more economical to the Government for the purpose of salvaging such camps or cantonments to buy real estate than to continue to pay rentals or claims for damages thereon, and except where industrial plants have been constructed or taken over by the Government for war purposes and the purchase of land is necessary in order to protect the interest of the Government."

And

Whereas doubt exists as to the proper interpretation of said provision and the intention of Congress as expressed in said provision:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the foregoing provision of said act shall not be construed to prevent payment from said unexpended balances for lands where requisition of the title thereto was duly served and possession taken thereunder and substantial buildings erected thereon, or where a binding agreement for the purchase of lands was followed by the taking of possession thereof, and erection of substantial buildings thereon, prior to the approval of said act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Amend the title by striking out the first word of the second line, "titile," and inserting the word "title," so that the title will read:

"To permit the payment for certain lands where requisition of the title thereto was duly served and possession taken thereunder, or where a binding agreement was entered into, followed by the taking possession thereof and erection of improvements thereon, prior to July 11, 1919."

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

The bill (S. 1273) to prohibit intoxicating liquors and prostitution within the canal zone, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that may go over. It was incorporated in the prohibition-enforcement act which passed the Senate the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

TRAINING IN AERONAUTIC ENGINEERING.

The bill (S. 2733) to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "and he is authorized to furnish to institutions to which officers are so detailed such equipment and material belonging to the War Department for use in connection with courses in aeronautic engineering as he may deem advisable, subject to such rules for use, compensation for use, accounting, report, and return as he may prescribe,' so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to detail such officers of the Army as he may select, not exceeding 25 at any one time, to attend and pursue courses of aeronautic engineering or associate study at such schools, colleges, and universities as he may select.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is authorized to pay tuition for the officers so detailed and to provide them with necessary textbooks and technical supplies from any moneys available for the Air Service of the Army not otherwise specifically appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering."

CIVILIAN PASSENGERS ON ARMY TRANSPORTS.

The bill (S. 2734) to authorize the transportation of civilians across the Atlantic Ocean upon Army transports under such rules and regulations and at such rates as the Secretary of War may prescribe was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 3, line 24, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "to be credited to the appropriation from which the expenses of operating such transports are paid" and to insert in lieu thereof "as miscellaneous receipts," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to provide for and to permit the carriage of passengers and their personal baggage, for hire, upon United States transports crossing the Atlantic Ocean between such ports of the United States and Europe as said transports shall use in due course of their employment as such, as he shall designate, under such rules and regulations and at such rates as he shall prescribe: Provided, That such transportation of passengers shall be carried on in such a manner as to in no way interfere with the transportation of Government troops or officers or of persons now entitled to carriage on such transports or with the service for which they are maintained and operated.

SEC. 2. That before any such civilian passengers are carried the Secretary of War shall establish a schedule of rates therefor, which shall be adequate for the service rendered and the accommodations afforded, but shall not be less than the rates charged by commercial passenger vessels sailing between the same ports for like service and accommodations.

SEC. 3. That such Army transports shall continue to be maintained and operated solely for the purposes heretofore permitted by law, and shall not be operated, nor shall sailings or schedules therefor be arranged, for any other purpose by virtue of this act. Preferences in all accommodations aboard ship shall be given to troops and to officers in the service of the United States, and persons now or hereafter entitled by law to be carried on Army transports at Government expense, and to the families of such officers, troops, and persons, and no civilian passengers for hire shall be carried where the effect will be to impair the present service to, or to discommode troops, officers, or persons now entitled by law to be carried.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War, or his authorized representative, may exclude from transportation upon said transports any person or classes of persons not now entitled by law to be carried thereon whom he shall designate. No alien will be accepted for transportation upon any transport sailing to any port of the United States until provision is first made by the proper immigration and inspection officials for examinations, inspections, detention, quarantine, and the performance of any other duty or function required to be performed before aliens are permitted to land in the United States in such a manner as to comply with the immigration and inspection laws.

SEC. 5. That no person shall be accepted for transportation to any port of the United States who is not or will not upon arrival be prima facie entitled to land in this country. Civilian passengers not now entitled by law to be carried on transports will be accepted only for those ports at which provision is or shall be made for proper immigration and customs inspections and the collection of such duties as may be imposed by law.

SEC. 6. That the proceeds arising from the carriage of such passengers shall be reported and accounted for as required by the accounting laws of the United States, and paid into the Treasury as "Miscellaneous receipts." No moneys will be expended for the purpose of making alterations in or fitting up any such transports for the purpose of carrying the civilian passengers herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY TO DEPENDENT RELATIVES OF DECEASED OFFICERS AND MEN.

The bill (S. 2497) to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to get a little light on this bill. What I gather from the reading of the bill is that it proposes to put into force the same practice that was in vogue by the War Department before the war-risk insurance act was passed. That act provides for the insurance of officers and men, and I can not see why this should be reenacted. I should like to have some member of the committee explain why.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, a precisely similar bill was passed at the last session by the Senate and reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, but was lost.

Since 1908 the six months' gratuity—for it is nothing more than that, nor nothing less—has been granted to the family of every officer and man who died in the service, to provide for the immediate expenses of the funeral. That has been the rule since 1908. When the war-risk insurance act came into force it was so construed as to repeal that provision. The Secretary of War makes this recommendation that the gratuity to the Regular Army, to whom alone it is confined, ought to be continued. The committee felt with him that it was only fair that when an officer or man in the service dies six months' pay should be at once given to his family to provide for the immediate expenses incident to his death, and therefore recommended it.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be absolutely correct, but under the war-risk act, while the dependents may not receive the check immediately they do receive the compensation and remuneration from the Government. This is simply putting back an old practice of the War Department to give six months' pay to any officer's or enlisted man's family who may die while in the service. Of course, if the Senate wants to do that, well and good, but that is what the bill amounts to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PEACE TREATY.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. It is very well known that I have participated to a very limited extent in the discussion of the various matters that have come before the Senate during the present session. I have not taken any part whatsoever in the discussions growing out of the treaty and the league of nations covenant. My only communications with reference to the latter subject have been expressed in private conference with my colleagues on both sides of the Chamber. I am not aware of having expressed my views with reference to the treaty with anything like fullness to any representative of the press, except one from my own State.

On yesterday there appeared in the Washington Post quite a lengthy statement on the first page of that paper, written by one of the correspondents of the paper and published in large type, an article which purports to give my views and my position upon the league of nations with great fullness of detail.

It is not my purpose to enter into any discussion of my position in reference to the league of nations nor of the league itself at this time, nor to engage in any controversy with the author of the article, but simply to make a statement of my position which will show that the article misrepresented my position in every particular. I will, therefore, without going into detail, content myself with the following brief general statement with respect to this matter:

The statements contained in the Sunday's issue of the Washington Post relative to my position with respect to the treaty and league of nations covenant was unauthorized and flagrantly misrepresents my attitude with respect to that great document.

I am in favor of and would gladly vote for the treaty and the league covenant as it was originally presented to the Senate by the President, without amendment or reservation. I agree with the President's interpretation of the controverted provisions of that document, and I do not believe it contains anything which would jeopardize American interests. I also believe it is of the highest importance to this country and the world that it should be ratified without further delay.

However, after a thorough study of the situation in the Senate, I am convinced that some concessions in the way of reservations will have to be made to secure its ratification, and, so believing, I have recently discussed with a number of my colleagues the advisability of reaching some compromise between those who favor the treaty without reservation and those who are in favor of it with conservative reservations of an interpretative character.

I am utterly opposed, however, to the reservations proposed by the Foreign Relations Committee. Some of these reservations are, in substance and essence, amendments which would radically change the scope and character of the instrument, emasculating some of the main provisions of the league, and which would call for reconsideration by the peace conference.

PAY TO DEPENDENT RELATIONS OF DECEASED OFFICERS AND MEN.

The SECRETARY. The next business on the calendar is Senate joint resolution 69——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to object to the bill preceding the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not object. I simply wanted to make a statement with reference to it, and then let the Senate take such action as it might see fit.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I object to the present consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

CONDITIONS IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 69) appointing a commission to report on conditions in the Virgin Islands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with an amendment, in line 10, page 2, to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500," so as to read:

Whereas the United States acquired from Denmark the islands of St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. Johns, commonly known as the Virgin Islands; and

Whereas there is but little information as to the needs of said islands on the part of the American Congress; and

Whereas the United States Government is charged with the solemn duty to establish a stable government in said islands and to do all that it possibly can for the people thereof: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint commission, to consist of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, to be appointed by the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the House, respectively, is hereby created to visit the said Virgin Islands and to report fully to Congress as to whether or not the present plan of government of said islands is conducive to their welfare; what, if anything, Congress should do to stimulate industry and agriculture in said islands, and anything else with relation thereto that may be of aid to the American Congress in dealing with the problem of the government and advancement of the people of said islands. There is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,500 to be used only for the expenses of the members of said commission in visiting the said islands. Said commission shall file its report before the 1st day of January, 1920, and said commission shall end on said date.

The amendment was agreed to.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL SECURITY AND DEFENSE ACT.

The bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I understood the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], to say that he desired to insist upon the consideration of that bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill this morning.

Mr. THOMAS. I assumed from that that when it was reached upon the calendar, as it has now been reached, the Senator would press for the consideration of the bill. There is one amendment reported to the bill upon which I desire to submit some observations. I do not think it would be a very wise provision to insert in the proposed statute. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill if the Senator from North Dakota really thinks it important that it should be disposed of this morning, but I regard the amendment on page 4 of the bill as one of very great importance and one which should not be voted upon without a full understanding of its terms and operation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the bill until we get through with the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). The bill goes over on objection.

The bill (S. 131) to provide that petty officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have some information with regard to what the effect of this measure will be; what it is going to cost the Government of the United States; and what has been the practice in the past. However, I do not see at this moment any member of the committee present, and therefore will ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

So as to make the bill read:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD SIGERFOOS.

The bill (S. 2807) to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Edward Sigerfoos, deceased, who was a colonel in the United States Army, and who was nominated by the President for appointment as brigadier general October 4, 1918, said nomination being confirmed by the Senate October 10, 1918, after the death of said Edward Sigerfoos, which occurred after his nomination, October 7, 1918, as the result of wounds received in line of duty, shall hereafter be held and considered to have become a brigadier general of the United States Army in the service of the United States, and to have held that office until the date of his death; and the President is hereby authorized to issue a commission as brigadier general of the United States Army in the name of Edward Sigerfoos, with rank to date from October 4, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in behalf of this measure. Col. Edward Sigerfoos was one of the ablest and best of the many splendid officers who went to Europe to fight for their country's cause.

On September 29 he was sent to the battle line and, while in the line of duty, was struck by a shell. On October 4 the President sent his nomination to the United States Senate for the commission of brigadier general. On October 7 Col. Sigerfoos died without any knowledge of the promotion that had been accorded to him by the President. On October 10, three days after his death, the Senate of the United States confirmed his nomination. On October 20, I believe, The Adjutant General, who had therefore sent the commission to Mrs. Sigerfoos, first learned of the death of Col. Sigerfoos. He felt that under the law he was obliged to recall the commission and wrote to Mrs. Sigerfoos asking her to return it, which she did. Now, this gallant officer's widow, mother of his fatherless children, desires this commission not only as a recognition of the bravery and the splendid services of her husband, but as a heritage for herself and her children. I am sure there can be no objection to the passage of the bill, and thereby give to the widow the object of her heart's desire.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the report on the bill just passed was presented by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2807) to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos, having had the same under consideration, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

This is an unusual case; in fact, there has been only one similar, so far as could be ascertained from the records of the War Department. It appears that Col. Sigerfoos was commissioned, after the outbreak of the war with Germany, as a temporary colonel in the Regular Army and later commissioned a colonel in the National Army. On October 4, 1918, he was nominated by the President to be a brigadier general, and was confirmed by the Senate on October 10. His commission was signed by the President and sent to his wife, who received it on October 21. Prior to his nomination for advanced rank, he was sent from the School of the Line, of which he had been commandant, to take command of the Fifty-sixth Brigade, Twenty-eighth Division, in the Argonne. While going to the front to assume command of the brigade, he was struck by a shell and, on October 7, died from his wounds. It will be noted that his death occurred between the time he was nominated and the date of his confirmation by the Senate. At the request of The Adjutant General, after the news of Col. Sigerfoos's death had been received by the War Department, his widow returned the commission. It is the purpose of this bill to permit the commission to be issued to Mrs. Sigerfoos, that she may preserve it.

In the Sixty-third Congress a law having a similar object was enacted, permitting the issuance of a commission, after the death of the officer, in the name of Maj. John T. Haines.

Your committee believes that, in view of the fact that Col. Sigerfoos was nominated and confirmed and that he received his fatal injuries while on his way to assume a command usually given to a brigadier general, that the bill should pass.

MILITARY MERIT BADGE.

The bill (S. 2780) authorizing a military merit badge and additional pay based thereon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, be, and he is hereby, authorized to award, but not in the name of Congress, a military merit badge, of appropriate design, to any enlisted man who shall hereafter complete a full three years' enlistment period of three years of continuous service with a record of exemplary behavior, good appearance, efficiency, fidelity during the whole of such period; and a suitable bar or other device for each subsequent three years' enlistment period or three years of continuous service similarly completed. That each enlisted man of the Army, to whom a military merit badge, bar, or device shall be awarded shall be entitled to additional pay for the first such award at the rate of $1 per month, and for each additional award at the rate of 50 cents per month from the date of each such award, but the right to such additional pay and the right to wear the badge herein authorized may be withdrawn or suspended, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, for misconduct on the part of any enlisted man to whom the badge shall have been awarded. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to expend from the appropriation for contingent expenses of his department from time to time such sums as may be necessary to defray the cost of such badges, bars, or other devices.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The bill (S. 2809) relating to compensation and war-risk insurance for members of the Philippine Scouts under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the compensation for death or disability hereafter paid to members of the Philippine Scouts who are natives of the Philippine Islands, under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, shall be one-half of the corresponding amount specified in that act.

SEC. 2. That insurance under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, may be applied for by members of the Philippine Scouts within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation, or after the date of approval of this act: Provided, That members of the Philippine Scouts who were in active service between October 12, 1917, and November 11, 1918, may apply for such insurance within 120 days from the date of approval of this act, but any person applying for insurance under this proviso whose period of service in which he was serving between the said dates has terminated, shall not be entitled thereto unless the termination of such service was under honorable conditions: Provided further, That those members of the Philippine Scouts who applied for insurance under the terms of an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, within 120 days from October 12, 1917, or within 120 days from the date of their entry into or employment in active service and prior to resignation or discharge, shall be held to have been covered by insurance in force as applied for by them from the date of their applications, and they shall have the right of reinstatement of such insurance under such regulations as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe. Members of the Philippine Scouts affected by this proviso shall not be allowed to apply for new insurance under the authority of this act, but shall be allowed to increase any insurance previously applied for to the maximum allowed by law within 120 days from the date of approval of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2923) to provide funds for the care and maintenance of the graves on foreign soil of members of the military forces of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, here, and I want to inquire about this bill. I therefore object to its consideration at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

FREDERICK W. COBB.

The bill (S. 412) to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinists, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerks, United States Navy, temporary lieutenant, Pay Corps, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to appoint Frederick W. Cobb, now a chief machinist, United States Navy, temporary lieutenant, United States Navy, to be a chief pay clerk, United States Navy, temporary lieutenant, Pay Corps, United States Navy, provided that he shall be placed at the foot of the list of chief pay clerks as it exists on the date of the passage of the act, and provided further that he shall receive the same pay as a chief pay clerk of like rank and length of commissioned service as though his commissioned service had been rendered in the grade of chief pay clerk.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That concludes the bills on the calendar.

EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECHES.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask unanimous consent that certain remarks of the President bearing on the pending treaty be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANLEY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] this morning offered the addresses of the President and had them inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMICK. These do not all express views identical with those recently uttered by the President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. These are former addresses?

Mr. McCORMICK. They cover a considerable period.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. It will be very interesting to see how the former remarks coincide with the recent ones.

The extracts from the President's utterances are as follows:

"The certain prospect of the success of the Republican Party is that we shall be drawn in one form or other into the embroilments of the European war." (Speech at Shadow Lawn, Sept. 30, 1916.)

"Senator McCUMBER. Would our moral conviction of the unrighteousness of the German war have brought us into this war if Germany had not committed any acts against us without the league of nations, as we had no league of nations at that time?

"The PRESIDENT. I hope it would eventually, Senator, as things developed.

"Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens that we would have gotten into this war?

"The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

"Senator McCUMBER. You think we would have gotten in anyway?

"The PRESIDENT. I do." (Meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate with the President, Aug. 19, 1919.)

"In all the belligerent countries men have drawn together to accomplish a successful prosecution of the war. Is it not a more desirable thing that all Americans should put partisan prepossessions aside and draw together for the successful prosecution of peace? I covet that distinction for America." (Address to the Railways Business Association in New York City, Jan. 27, 1916.)

NEUTRALITY AND PEACE.

"The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another." (Appeal to the American people for neutrality, Aug. 19, 1914.)

"The great war that broke so suddenly upon the world two years ago, and which has swept within its flame so great a part of the civilized world, has affected us very profoundly, and we are not only at liberty, it is perhaps our duty, to speak very frankly of it and of the great interests of civilization which it affects.

"With its causes and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which its stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore." (Address before the League to Enforce Peace, Washington, May 27, 1916.)

"There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before, seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards. * * *

"Every nation now engaged in the titantic struggle on the other side of the water believes, with intensity of conviction that can not be exaggerated, that it is fighting for its rights, and in most instances that it is fighting for its life; and we must not be too critical of the men who lead those nations." (Speech at Des Moines, Feb. 1, 1916.)

"It would tear the heartstrings of America to be at war with any of the great nations of the world. We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it." (Speech at Kansas City, Feb. 2, 1916.)

"You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. * * * I do not doubt that I shall continue to succeed." (Letter to Senator Stone, then chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Feb. 24, 1916.)

"I can assure you that nothing is nearer my heart than keeping this country out of war." (Address to a delegation of Scandinavians in the White House, Mar. 13, 1916.)

"The European war * * * is a competition of foreign standards, of national traditions, and of national politics—political systems." (Address at Charlotte, N. C., May 20, 1916.)

"We have been neutral, not only because it was the fixed and traditional policy of the United States to stand aloof from the politics of Europe * * * but because it was manifestly our duty to prevent, if it were possible, the extension of the fires of hate and desolation kindled by that terrible conflict." (Speech accepting renomination, Sept. 2, 1916.)

"The American people do not desire it (war), and our desire is not different from theirs. I am not proposing or contemplating war or any steps that need led to it. No course of my choosing or of theirs will lead to war. War can come only by the willful acts and aggressions of others." (Address to Congress, Feb. 26, 1917.)

"There is no precedent in American history for any action which might mean that America is seeking to connect herself with the controversies on the other side of the water. Men who seek to provoke such action have forgotten the traditions of the United States, but it behooves those you have intrusted with office to remember the traditions of the United States." (Speech at Milwaukee, Jan. 31, 1916.)

"I believe that we can serve the nations at war better by remaining at peace and holding off from this contest than we could possibly serve them in any other way. Your interest, your sympathy, your affection may be engaged on one side or the other, but it is your duty to stand off and not let this Nation be drawn into the war." (Speech at Chicago, Jan. 31, 1916.)

"Recalling the humane and enlightened attitude hitherto assumed by the Imperial German Government in matters of international right, and particularly with regard to the freedom of the seas; having learned to recognize the German views and the German influence in the field of international obligation as always upon the side of justice and humanity, the Government of the United States was loth to believe, it can not now bring itself to believe, that these acts, so absolutely contrary to the rules, the practices, and the spirit of modern warfare, could have the countenance or sanction of that great Government. * * *

"Long acquainted as this Government has been with the character of the Imperial German Government and with the high principles of equity by which they have in the past been actuated and guided, the Government of the United States can not believe that the commanders of the vessels which committed these acts of lawlessness did so except under a misapprehension of the orders issued by the Imperial German naval authorities." (First Lusitania note, May 10, 1915.)

"The example of America must be a special example. The example of America must be the example of peace, not merely because it will not fight, but of peace because peace is the healing and the elevating influence of the world and strife is not. There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight." (Address to newly naturalized American citizens, at Philadelphia, May 10, 1915.)

"America stands apart in its ideals; it ought not to allow itself to be drawn, as far as its heart is concerned, into anybody's quarrel." (Address to the Daughters of the American Revolution, Oct. 11, 1915.)

"During these days of terrible war, it would seem that every man who was truly an American would instinctively make it his duty and his pride to keep the scales of judgment even and prove himself a partisan of no nation but his own. But there are some men among us, calling themselves Americans, who have so far forgotten themselves and their honor as citizens as to put their passionate sympathy with one or the other side in the great European conflict above their regard for the peace of the United States." (Annual message to Congress, Dec. 7, 1915.)

APPEAL FOR DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY.

"If you have approved of my leadership and wish me to continue to be your unembarrassed spokesman at home and abroad, I earnestly beg that you will express yourself unmistakably to that effect by returning a Democratic majority in both the Senate and the House of Representatives." (Statement to the voters of the country, Oct. 24, 1918.)

"An acute English historical scholar has said that 'the Americans of the United States are a Nation because they once obeyed a king'; we shall remain a Nation only by obeying leaders." (Essay on the character of democracy in the United States appearing in The Old Master and Other Essays.)

"His (the President's) is the only national voice in affairs. Let him once win the admiration and confidence of the country, and no other single force can withstand him, no combination of forces will easily overpower him. * * * His office is anything he has the sagacity and force to make it. * * * The personal force of the President is perfectly constitutional to any extent to which he chooses to exercise it. * * * The President can never again be the mere domestic figure he has been throughout so large a part of our history." (From Chapter III of Constitutional Government in the United States, by Woodrow Wilson.)

"His (the President's) only power of compelling compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiation, which affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in the view of the world to certain courses of action, that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State.

"The machinery of consultation between the Senate and the President is, of course, the committee machinery. The Senate sends treaties to its standing Committee on Foreign Relations, which ponders the President's messages accompanying the treaties and sets itself to understand the situation in the light of all the information available. * * * There seems to have been at one time a tendency toward a better practice. In 1813 the Senate sought to revive the early custom, in accordance with which the President delivered his messages in person, by requesting the attendance of the President to consult upon foreign affairs; but Mr. Madison declined." (From Chapter IV of Congressional Government, by Woodrow Wilson.)

"One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all—his control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of the Nation. The initiative in foreign affairs, which the President possesses without any restriction whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely. The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy, and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained. He need disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also." (Woodrow Wilson's "Constitutional Government in the United States," Chapter III, 1917.)

"But there is another course which the President may follow, and which one or two Presidents of unusual political sagacity have followed, with the satisfactory results that were to have been expected. He may himself be less stiff and offish, may himself act in the true spirit of the Constitution and establish intimate relations of confidence with the Senate on his own initiative, not carrying his plans to completion and then laying them in final form before the Senate to be accepted or rejected, but keeping himself in confidential communication with the leaders of the Senate while his plans are in course, when their advice will be of service to him and his information of the greatest service to them, in order that there may be veritable counsel and a real accommodation of views instead of a final challenge and contest. The policy which has made rivals of the President and Senate has shown itself in the President as often as in the Senate, and if the Constitution did intend that the Senate should in such matters be an executive council it is not only the privilege of the President to treat it as such, it is also his best policy and his plain duty." (Woodrow Wilson's "Constitutional Government in the United States," Chapter V, 1917.)

"I have sought this opportunity to address you because I thought that I owed it to you, as the council associated with me in the final determination of our international obligations, to disclose to you without reserve the thought and purpose that have been taking form in my mind in regard to the duty of our Government in the days to come, when it will be necessary to lay afresh and upon a new plan the foundations of peace among the nations." (Address to the Senate, Jan. 22, 1917.)

"May I not hope, gentlemen of the Congress, that in the delicate tasks I shall have to perform on the other side of the sea, in my efforts truly and faithfully to interpret the principles and purposes of the country we love, I may have the encouragement and the added strength of your united support? I am the servant of the Nation. I can have no private thought or purpose of my own in performing such an errand. I shall count upon your friendly countenance and encouragement. I shall not be inaccessible. The cables and the wireless will render me available for any counsel or service you may desire of me, and I shall be happy in the thought that I am constantly in touch with the weighty matters of domestic policy with which we shall have to deal." (Address to Congress, Dec. 2, 1918.)

"I am heartily glad that you have demanded an investigation with regard to the possession of texts of the treaty by unauthorized persons. I have felt that it was highly undesirable officially to communicate the text of a document which is still in negotiation and subject to change.

"Anyone who has possession of the official English text has what he is clearly not entitled to have or to communicate. I have felt in honor bound to act in the same spirit and in the same way as the representatives of the other great powers in this matter, and am confident my countrymen will not expect me to break faith with them." (Cablegram to Senator HITCHCOCK, June 9, 1919.)

"You know, there is temptation in loneliness and secrecy. Haven't you experienced it? I have. We are never so proper in our conduct as when everybody can look and see exactly what we are doing. If you are off in some distant part of the world and suppose that nobody who lives within a mile of your home is anywhere around, there are times when you adjourn your ordinary standards. You say to yourself: 'Well, I'll have a fling this time; nobody will know anything about it.' * * * The most dangerous thing in the world is to get off where nobody knows you." (From The New Freedom, by Woodrow Wilson, 1913, Chapter VI.)

"I say the heart of the country is in this war because it would not have gone into it if its heart had not been prepared for it. It would not have gone into it if it had not first believed that here was an opporunity to express the character of the United States. We have gone in with no special grievance of our own, because we have always said that we were the friends and servants of mankind." (Address at dedication of Red Cross Building, Washington, May 12, 1917.)

"It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign Government. The military masters of Germany denied us the right to be neutral—the war was begun by the military masters of Germany, who proved to be also the masters of Austria-Hungary. These men have never regarded nations as peoples—men, women, and children of like blood and frame as themselves—for whom governments existed and in whom governments had their life. They have regarded them merely as serviceable organizations which they could by force or intrigue bend or corrupt to their own purpose. They have regarded the smaller States, in particular, and the peoples who could be overwhelmed by force, as their natural tools and instruments of domination." (Flag Day address at Washington, June 14, 1917.)

"This war had its roots in the disregard of rights of small nations." (Address to Congress, February 11, 1918.)

"What is the war for? At first it seemed hardly more than a war of defense against the military aggression of Germany. Belgium had been violated, France invaded, and Germany was afield again, as in 1870 and 1866, to work out her ambitions in Europe; and it was necessary to meet force with force." (Address to the citizens of the United States on Labor Day, September 2, 1918.)

"I believe that Belgium and her part in the war are in one sense the key of the whole struggle, because the violation of Belgium was the call to duty which aroused the nations." (Address to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies at Brussels, June 19, 1919.)

"The enemy committed many outrages in this war, gentlemen, but the initial outrage was the fundamental outrage of all. They, with an insolent indifference, violated the sacredness of treaties. They showed that they did not care for the independence of any nation, whether it had raised its hand against them or not; that they were ruthless in their determination to have their whim at their pleasure.

"Therefore, it was the violation of Belgium that awakened the world to their realization of the character of the struggle." (Address to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies at Brussels, June 19, 1919.)

"America did not at first see the full meaning of the war that has just ended. At first it looked like a natural raking out of the pent-up jealousies and rivalries of the complicated politics of Europe." (Address to American soldiers and sailors returning to the United States aboard the George Washington, July 4, 1919.)

MR. WILSON ON THE PEACE.

THE 14 POINTS.

"I. Open covenants of peace openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

"II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

"III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

"IV. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

"V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

"VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

"VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

"VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Loraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

"IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

"X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

"XI. Roumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan States to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guaranties of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan States shall be entered into.

"XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guaranties.

"XIII. An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

"XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike." (Address to Congress, Jan. 8, 1918.)

"There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace:

"I. The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it can not be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence.

"II. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake or its own exterior influence or mastery.

"III. The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct toward each other by the same principles of honor and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern States in their relations with one another; to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right.

"IV. The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make it certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that can not be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

"These great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

"These great ends can not be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity. They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire." (Address at Mount Vernon, July 4, 1918.)

"These, then, are some of the particulars, and I state them with the greater confidence because I can state them authoritatively as representing this Government's interpretation of its own duty with regard to peace:

"First, the impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned;

"Second, no special or separate interest of any single nation or any group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all;

"Third, there can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the league of nations;

"Fourth, and more specifically, there can be no special, selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the league of nations itself as a means of discipline and control;

"Fifth, all international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world." (Address at Metropolitan Opera House, Septembr 27, 1918.)

"We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. Those issues are these:

"Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?

"Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?

"Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?

"Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations, or shall the strong do as they will and the weak suffer without redress?

"Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?" (Address at Metropolitan Opera House, Sept. 27, 1918.)

"You do not love humanity if you seek to divide humanity into jealous camps. Humanity can be welded together only by love, by sympathy, by justice, not by jealousy and hatred." (Address to newly naturalized American at Philadelphia, May 10, 1915.)

"Repeated utterances of the leading statesmen of most of the great nations now engaged in war have made it plain that their thought has come to this, that the principle of public right must henceforth take precedence over the individual interests of particular nations, and that the nations of the world must in some way band themselves together to see that right prevails as against any sort of selfish aggression; that henceforth alliance must not be set up against alliance, understanding against understanding, but that there must be a common agreement for a common object, and that at the heart of that common object must lie the inviolable rights of peoples and of mankind. The nations of the world have become each other's neighbors. It is to their interest that they should understand each other, it is imperative that they should agree to cooperate in a common cause, and that they should so act that the guiding principle of that common cause shall be even-handed and impartial justice." (Address to the League to Enforce Peace, May 27, 1916.)

"I said the other evening * * * that small and weak States had as much right to their sovereignty and independence as large and strong States." (Address at Arlington, Memorial Day, May 30, 1916.)

"There had been growing up in Europe a mutual suspicion, an interchange of conjectures about what this Government and that Government was going to do, an interlacing of alliances and understandings, a complex web of intrigue and spying, that presently was sure to entangle the whole of the family of mankind on that side of the water in its meshes. Now, revive that after this war is over and sooner or later you will have just such another war." (Address at Cincinnati, Oct. 26, 1916.)

"The objects which the statesmen of the belligerents on both sides have in mind in this war are virtually the same, as stated in general terms to their own peoples and to the world. Each side desires to make the rights and privileges of weak peoples and small States as secure against aggression or denial in the future as the rights and privileges of the great and powerful States now at war. Each wishes itself to be made secure in the future, along with all other nations and peoples, against the recurrence of wars like this and against aggression or selfish interference of every kind. * * * Each deems it necessary to settle the issues of the present war upon terms that will certainly safeguard the independence, the territorial integrity, and the political and commercial freedom of the nations involved." (Note to the belligerent Governments, dated Dec. 18, 1916.)

"If the contest must continue to proceed toward undefined ends by slow attrition until the one group of belligerents or the other is exhausted; if millions after millions of human lives must continue to be offered up until on the one side or the other there are no more to offer; if resentments must be kindled that can never cool and despairs engendered from which there can be no recovery, hopes of peace and of the willing concert of free peoples will be rendered vain and idle." (Note to the belligerent Governments, Dec. 18, 1916.)

"They (the statesmen of the nations at war) imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

"No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that Governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. * * * Any peace which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset. It will not rest upon the affections or the convictions of mankind. The ferment of spirit of whole populations will fight subtly and constantly against it, and all the world will sympathize. The world can be at peace only if its life is stable, and there can be no stability where the will is in rebellion, where there is not tranquillity of spirit and a sense of justice, of freedom, and of right.

"And the question of limiting naval armaments opens the wider and perhaps more difficult question of the limitation of armies and of all programs of military preparation. Difficult and delicate as these questions are, they must be faced with the utmost candor and decided in a spirit of real accommodation if real peace is to come, with healing in its wings, and come to stay. Peace can not be had without concession and sacrifice. There can be no sense of safety and equality among the nations if great preponderating armaments are henceforth to continue here and there to be built up and maintained." (Address to the Senate, Jan. 22, 1917.)

"Every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful." (Address to the Senate, Jan. 22, 1917.)

"We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war.

"Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nation's affairs. A steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic Government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. It must be a league of honor, a partnership of opinion. * * *

"We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included, for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We must have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make.

"It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with the desire to bring any injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible Government which has thrown aside all considerations of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us, however hard it may be for them for the time being to believe that this is spoken from our hearts." (Address to Congress, Apr. 2, 1917.)

"We are fighting for the liberty, the self-government, and the undictated development of all peoples, and every feature of the settlement that concludes this war must be conceived and executed for that purpose. Wrongs must first be righted and then adequate safeguards must be created to prevent their being committed again. * * *

"No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live. No territory must change hands except for the purpose of securing those who inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty. No indemnities must be insisted on, except those that constitute payments for manifest wrongs done. No readjustments of power must be made except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of its peoples." (Cablegram to Russia, May 26, 1917.)

"We know now as clearly as we knew before we were ourselves engaged that we are not the enemies of the German people and that they are not our enemies. They did not originate or desire this hideous war or wish that we should be drawn into it; and we are vaguely conscious that we are fighting their cause, as they will some day see it, as well as our own. * * *

"And the great fact that stands out above all the rest is that this is a people's war, a war for freedom and justice and self-government amongst all the nations of the world, a war to make the world safe for the peoples who live upon it and have made it their own, the German people themselves included." (Flag Day speech, June 14, 1917.)

"The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible Government. * * *

"This power is not the German people. It is the ruthless master of the German people. * * *

"Responsible statesmen must now everywhere see, if they never saw before, that no peace can rest securely upon political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations and cripple or embarrass others, upon vindictive action of any sort, or any kind of revenge or deliberate injury. The American people have suffered intolerable wrongs at the hands of the Imperial German Government, but they desire no reprisal upon the German people, who have themselves suffered all things in this war, which they did not choose. They believe that peace should rest upon the rights of peoples, not the rights of Governments—the rights of peoples great or small, weak or powerful—their equal right to freedom and security and self-government and to a participation upon fair terms in the economic opportunities of the world, the German people of course included if they will accept equality and not seek domination.

"The test, therefore, of every plan of peace is this: Is it based upon the faith of all the peoples involved or merely upon the word of an ambitious and intriguing Government on the one hand and of a group of free peoples on the other? This is a test which goes to the root of the matter; and it is the test which must be applied.

"We believe that the intolerable wrongs done in this war by the furious and brutal power of the Imperial German Government ought to be repaired, but not at the expense of the sovereignty of any people—rather a vindication of the sovereignty both of those that are weak and of those that are strong. Punitive damages, the dismemberment of empires, the establishment of selfish and exclusive economic leagues, we deem inexpedient and in the end worse than futile, no proper basis for a peace of any kind, least of all for an enduring peace. That must be based upon justice and fairness and the common rights of mankind." (Reply to the Pope, Aug. 27, 1917.)

"I believe that the spirit of freedom can get into the hearts of Germans and find as fine a welcome there as it can find in any other hearts. * * *

"Moreover, a settlement is always hard to avoid when the parties can be brought face to face. I can differ from a man much more radically when he is not in the room than I can when he is in the room, because then the awkward thing is he can come back at me and answer what I say. It is always dangerous for a man to have the floor entirely to himself. Therefore we must insist in every instance that the parties come into each other's presence and there discuss the issues between them and not separately in places which have no communication with each other." (Buffalo address, Nov. 12, 1917.)

"I believe that it is necessary to say plainly what we here at the seat of action consider the war to be for and what part we mean to play in the settlement of its searching issues. We are the spokesmen of the American people, and they have a right to know whether their purpose is ours. * * *

"I believe that I speak for them when I say two things: First, that this intolerable thing of which the masters of Germany have shown us the ugly face, this menace of combined intrigue and force which we now see so clearly as the German power, a thing without conscience or honor or capacity for covenanted peace, must be crushed and, if it be not utterly brought to an end, at least shut out from the friendly intercourse of the nations; and, second, that when this thing and its power are indeed defeated and the time comes that we can discuss peace—when the German people have spokesmen whose word we can believe and when those spokesmen are ready in the name of their people to accept the common judgment of the nations as to what shall henceforth be the basis of law and of covenant for the life of the world—we shall be willing and glad to pay the full price for peace, and pay it ungrudgingly. We know what that price will be. It will be full, impartial justice—justice done at every point and to every nation that the final settlement must affect, our enemies as well as our friends.

"You catch with me the voices of humanity that are in the air. They grow daily more audible, more articulate, more persuasive, and they come from the hearts of men everywhere. They insist that the war shall not end in vindictive action of any kind; that no nation or people shall be robbed or punished because the irresponsible rulers of a single country have themselves done deep and abominable wrong. It is this thought that has been expressed in the formula, 'No annexations, no contributions, no punitive indemnities.'

"Let it be said again that autocracy must first be shown the utter futility of its claims to power or leadership in the modern world. But when that has been done—as, God willing, it assuredly will be—we must at last be free to do an unprecedented thing, and this is the time to avow our purpose to do it. We shall be free to base peace on generosity and justice to the exclusion of all selfish claims to advantage on the part of the victors.

"The people of Germany are being told by the men whom they now permit to deceive them and to act as their masters that they are fighting for the very life and existence of their Empire, a war of desperate self-defense against deliberate aggression. Nothing could be more grossly or wantonly false, and we must seek by the utmost openness and candor as to our real aims to convince them of its falseness. We are in fact fighting for their emancipation from fear, along with our own—from the fear as well as from the fact of unjust attack by neighbors or rivals or schemers after world empire. No one is threatening the existence or the independence or the peaceful enterprise of the German Empire.

"The wrongs, the very deep wrongs, committed in this war will have to be righted. That of course. But they can not and must not be righted by the commission of similar wrongs against Germany and her allies. The world will not permit the commission of similar wrongs as a means of reparation and settlement. Statesmen must by this time have learned that the opinion of the world is everywhere wide awake and fully comprehends the issues involved. No representative of any self-governed nation will dare disregard it by attempting any such covenants of selfishness and compromise as were entered into at the Congress of Vienna. The thought of the plain people here and everywhere throughout the world, the people who enjoy no privilege and have very simple and unsophisticated standards of right and wrong, is the air all governments must henceforth breathe if they would live. * * *

"A supreme moment of history has come. The eyes of the people have been opened and they see. The hand of God is laid upon the nations. He will show them favor, I devoutly believe, only if they rise to the clear heights of His own justice and mercy." (Address to Congress, Dec. 4, 1917.)

"We owe it to ourselves, however, to say that we do not wish in any way to impair or to rearrange the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It is no affair of ours what they do with their own life, either industrially or politically. We do not purpose or desire to dictate to them in any way. We only desire to see that their affairs are left in their own hands in all matters, great and small." (Address to Congress, Dec. 4, 1917.)

"To whom have we been listening, then? To those who speak the spirit and intention of the resolutions of the German Reichstag of the 9th of January last, the spirit and intention of the liberal leaders and parties of Germany, or to those who resist and defy that spirit and intention and insist upon conquest and subjugation? Or are we listening, in fact, to both, unreconciled and in open and hopeless contradiction? These are very serious and pregnant questions. Upon the answers to them depends the peace of the world.

"It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open, and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world.

"We have no jealousy of German greatness, and there is nothing in this program that impairs it. We do not wish to injure her or to block in any way her legitimate influence or power. We do not wish to fight her either with arms or with hostile arrangements of trade if she is willing to associate herself with us and the other peace-loving nations of the world in covenants of justice and law and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world—the new world in which we now live—instead of a place of mastery." (Address to Congress Jan. 8, 1918.)

"* * * What we demand * * * is that the world be made safe * * * for every peace-loving nation which like our own wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression." (Address to Congress Jan. 8, 1918.)

"The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development." (Address to Congress Jan. 8, 1918.)

"The United States has no desire to interfere in European affairs or to act as arbiter in European territorial disputes. She would disdain to take advantage of any internal weakness or disorder to impose her own will upon another people." (Address to Congress Feb. 11, 1918.)

"All the parties in this war must join in the settlement of every issue anywhere involved in it; because what we are seeking is a peace that we can all unite to guarantee and maintain, and every item of it must be submitted to the common judgment, whether it be right and fair." (Address to Congress Feb. 11, 1918.)

"We are ready, whenever the final reckoning is made, to be just to the German people, deal fairly with the German power, as with all others. There can be no difference between peoples in the final judgment, if it is indeed to be a righteous judgment. To purpose anything but justice, even-handed and dispassionate justice, to Germany at any time, whatever the outcome of the war, would be to renounce and dishonor our own cause, for we ask nothing that we are not willing to accord. * * *

"They (the military masters of Germany) are enjoying in Russia a cheap triumph in which no brave or gallant nation can long take pride. A great people, helpless by their own act, lies for the time at their mercy. Their fair professions are forgotten. They nowhere set up justice, but everywhere impose their power and exploit everything for their own use and aggrandizement; and the peoples of conquered Provinces are invited to be free under their dominion!" (Liberty loan speech in Baltimore, Apr. 6, 1918.)

"If it be indeed and in truth the common object of the Governments associated against Germany and of the nations whom they govern, as I believe it to be, to achieve by the coming settlements a secure and lasting peace, it will be necessary that all who sit down at the peace table shall come ready and willing to pay the price, the only price, that will procure it. That price is impartial justice in every item of the settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed; and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with. * * *

"The counsels of plain men have become on all hands more simple and straightforward and more unified than the counsels of sophisticated men of affairs, who still retain the impression that they are playing a game of power and playing for high stakes. That is why I have said that this is a people's war, not a statesmen's. Statesmen must follow the clarified common thought or be broken.

"Special alliances and economic rivalries and hostilities have been the prolific source in the modern world of the plans and passions that produce war. It would be an insincere as well as an insecure peace that did not exclude them in definite and binding terms." (Address at Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, Sept. 27, 1918.)

"We have used great words, all of us have used the great words 'right' and 'justice,' and now we are to prove whether or not we understand these words and how they are to be applied to the particular settlements which must conclude this war. And we must not only understand them, but we must have the courage to act upon our understanding." (Speech at Buckingham Palace, London, Dec. 27, 1918.)

"They fought to do away with an old order and to establish a new one, and the center and characteristic of the old order was that unstable thing which we used to call the 'balance of power,' a thing in which the balance was determined by the sword which was thrown in on the one side or the other, a balance which was determined by the unstable equilibrium of competitive interests, a balance which was maintained by jealous watchfulness and an antagonism of interests which, though it was generally latent, was always deep-seated." (Speech at London, Dec. 28, 1918.)

"It is from quiet places like this all over the world that the forces are accumulated that presently will overpower any attempt to accomplish evil on a great scale. It is like the rivulet that gathers into the river and the river that goes to the sea. So there come out of communities like these streams that fertilize the conscience of men, and it is the conscience of the world we now mean to place upon the throne which others tried to usurp." (Address at the Lowther Street Congregational Church, London, Dec. 29, 1918.)

"And so it does seem to me that the theme that we must have in our minds now in this great day of settlement is the theme of common interest and the determination of what it is that is our common interest. * * * For the moment there is the slightest departure from the nice adjustment of interests, then jealousies begin to spring up. There is only one thing that can bind peoples together, and that is common devotion to right.

"Therefore it seems to me that in the settlement which is just ahead of us something more delicate and difficult than was ever before attempted has to be accomplished—a genuine concert of mind and of purpose. * * *

"We must provide the machinery for readjustments in order that we have the machinery of good will and friendship. Friendship must have a machinery. If I can not correspond with you, not cooperate with you, I can not be your friend, and if the world is to remain a body of friends it must have the means of friendship, the means of constant friendly intercourse, the means for constant watchfulness over the common interests." (Speech at Manchester, England, Dec. 30, 1918.)

"* * * the President said:

"'I am glad you asked me that, for I want to tell you a good joke on myself. I did not see this joke until I came over here. Under the league of nations there will be no neutrals. They will all be in the league and subject to the league's decisions on the matter of the exertion of armed force. If there are no neutrals there will be no issue over sea rights, for the freedom of the seas puzzle arose over relations between belligerents and neutrals. The league will now settle all matters of naval policy. So it might be said, "There ain't no such thing" as an issue of freedom of the seas.'"

"Mr. Wilson was asked if the British had brought that argument to him, and Mr. Wilson replied, 'No; I arrived at that conclusion in the privacy of my own soul.'" (London Times, weekly edition, Paris correspondence.)

"But we can not stand in the shadow of this war without knowing there are things which are in some senses more difficult than those we have undertaken, because, while it is easy to speak of right and justice, it is sometimes difficult to work them out in practice, and there will be required a purity of motives and disinterestedness of object which the world has never witnessed before in the councils of nations.

"There is only one thing that holds nations together, if you exclude force, and that is friendship and good will. The only thing that binds men together is friendship, and by the same token the only thing that binds nations together is friendship. Therefore our task at Paris is to organize the friendship of the world; to see to it that all the moral forces that make for right and justice and liberty are united and are given a vital organization to which the peoples of the world will readily and gladly respond." (Speech before the Italian Chamber of Deputies at Rome, Jan. 3, 1919.)

"Perhaps you gentlemen think of the members of your Government and the members of other governments who are going to confer in the city of Paris as the real makers of war and peace; but we are not. You are the makers of war and of peace. The pulse of the modern world beats on the farms and in the mines and in the factories. * * * That is one reason why, unless we establish friendships, unless we establish sympathies, we clog all the processes of modern life." (Speech to the citizens of Turin, Italy, Jan. 6, 1919.)

"We are here to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. Those foundations were the private choice of a small coterie of civil rulers and military staffs. Those foundations were the aggression of great powers upon the small. Those foundations were the power of small bodies of men to wield their will and use mankind as pawns in a game. And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace." (Address before the peace conference, Jan. 25, 1919.)

"So it is for that reason that I have said to those with whom I am at present associated, that this must be a people's peace, because this was a people's war. The people won this war, not the Governments, and the people must reap the benefits of the war. At every turn we must see to it that it is not an adjustment between Governments merely, but an arrangement for the peace and security of men and women everywhere." (Address to delegation of working women, Paris, Jan. 26, 1919.)

"The rulers of the world have been thinking of the relations of Governments and forgetting the relations of peoples. They have been thinking of the maneuvers of international dealings, when what they ought to have been thinking of was the fortunes of men and women and the safety of homes, and the care that they should take that their people should be happy because they were safe.

"The nations of the world are about to consummate a brotherhood which will make it unnecessary in the future to maintain those crushing armaments which make the peoples suffer almost as much in peace as they suffered in war.

"So, as we sit from day to day at the Quai d'Orsay, I think to myself, we might, if we could gain an audience of the free peoples of the world, adopt the language of Gen. Pershing and say, 'Friends, men, humble women, little children, we are here; we are here as your friends, as your champions, as your representatives. We have come to work out for you a world which is fit to live in and in which all countries can enjoy the heritage of liberty for which France and America and England and Italy have paid so dear.'" (Speech in the French Chamber of Deputies, Paris, Feb. 3, 1919.)

"The men who are in conference in Paris realize as keenly as any American can realize that they are not the masters of their people; that they are the servants of their people, and that the spirit of their people has awakened to a new purpose and a new conception of their power to realize that purpose; and that no man dare go home from that conference and report anything less noble than was expected of it.

"And I said I have had this sweet revenge: Speaking with perfect frankness, in the name of the people of the United States, I have uttered as the objects of this great war ideals, and nothing but ideals, and the war has been won by that inspiration." (Message to the American people, Boston, Feb. 24, 1919.)

"Do not let yourselves suppose for a moment that the uneasiness in the populations of Europe is due entirely to economic causes or economic motives; something very much deeper underlies it all than that. They see that their Governments have never been able to defend them against intrigue or aggression, and that there is no force or foresight or of prudence in any modern cabinet to stop war. And therefore they say, 'There must be some fundamental cause for this,' and the fundamental cause they are beginning to perceive to be that nations have stood singly or in little jealous groups against each other, fostering prejudice, increasing the danger of war rather than concerting measures to prevent it; and that if there is right in the world, if there is justice in the world, there is no reason why nations should be divided in the support of justice.

"They are therefore saying if you really believe that there is a right, if you really believe that wars ought to be stopped, stop thinking about the rival interests of nations, and think about men and women and children throughout the world. * * * There can be no mercy where there is no hope, for why should you spare another if you expect yourself to perish? Why should you be pitiful if you can get no pity? Why should you be just if, upon every hand, you are put upon?" (Address at Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, Mar. 4, 1919.)

"The war was ended, moreover, by proposing to Germany an armistice and peace which should be founded on certain clearly defined principles which set up a new order of right and justice. Upon those principles the peace with Germany has been conceived, not only, but formulated. Upon those principles it will be executed." (Statement dealing with the Italian-Jugo-Slav dispute, Paris, Apr. 23, 1919.)

"The peoples of the world are awake and the peoples of the world are in the saddle. Private counsels of statesmen can not now and can not hereafter determine the destinies of nations." (Memorial Day address, France, May 30, 1919.)

"For if this is not the final battle for right there will be another that will be final." (Memorial Day address, France, May 30, 1919.)

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

Mr. EDGE. As the calendar has been completed, unless there is some other business to be taken up before 2 o'clock, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2472, the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Montana in the chair). The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2472, to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before that motion is acted on, I desire to occupy a few moments of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion made by the Senator from New Jersey is not debatable.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are some Senators absent who desire to be here when the bill is taken up.

Mr. ASHURST. We will call for a quorum right afterwards.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESSES.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I observe from reading the daily papers that the President of the United States has taken to the hustings and is debating before the people the league of nations. I have no comment to make upon the action of the President in this regard except to say that inasmuch as he is well equipped to conduct such a debate, has under his command the resources of his great office, has the luxuries and the conveniences of travel at the expense of the Government, is surrounded by a body of competent and able clerks and reporters, I assume it will not be inappropriate, since he has the opportunity and the facility of answering any questions that are submitted to him, to call attention to a few principles that are involved in the covenant of the league of nations which he is discussing.

The President is going west, and it seems that the farther west he goes the more vituperative he becomes and his feeling more intense. I make these preliminary remarks in justification of calling attention to certain questions which have been suggested by the speeches which the President has already made on this tour.

The President says that we should protect Armenia. Military authorities, Mr. President, estimate that 150,000 men would be required for this purpose, and that it would cost a billion dollars. Of course, the protection of Armenia, which the President urges as one of the immediate duties involving upon us under the league of nations, means the policing of Turkey. It is impossible to protect Armenia without policing Turkey. Turkey is the power from whose ruthlessness Armenia is to be protected. I notice that one press agent of the administration in Europe estimates that it would take 100,000 men to perform this duty. Experts in the War Department, however, estimate that it would take 150,000 men. But whether it would require 100,000 men or 150,000 men it would cost the United States more than $1,000,000,000 to raise, equip, train, transport for 4,000 miles, and maintain in Asia this army for a length of time sufficient to establish the permanent safety of Armenia.

Upon whom, Mr. President, will the taxes fall to raise the billion dollars that will be required under this obligation which the President is urging Congress to assume? To raise this $1,000,000,000 will not the taxes inevitably be passed along until they rest upon the consumer and burden the poor? I may interpolate here the suggestion that while efforts are made to frame tax bills so that the burden rests upon the rich, by the operation of natural laws, over which Congress has no control, the vast sums of money required for the support of military expeditions into distant parts of the world when put in the form of taxes are passed along from those upon whom they are nominally levied until inevitably they rest upon the prices of necessities of life and create the problem known as the high cost of living.

The President says if the league of nations is not adopted he can not deal with the problem of the high cost of living. The high cost of living is due to the obligations, to the expenses, and to the burdens which have been imposed upon this Nation by the peace conference, which was composed of the same nations that will compose the league of nations and controlled by the same powers and which imposed upon the Government and the people of the United States the same obligations that will be imposed upon them permanently if the peace conference is continued in Paris or in Geneva by a permanent government known as the league of nations.

How is the army that is to police Turkey to be raised? Whose sons are to compose it? If those who are in favor of organizing and sending to Armenia an army of 100,000 men have sons whom they will bring forward to offer for this service, some of them to die, in a duty which does not devolve upon us, but ought to devolve upon the nations which are situated in the proximity of Turkey and Armenia, those people who are willing to offer their sons probably could not be criticized as being selfish or unfair in advocating the adoption of this policy. But if they are not, they have no just right to demand that the sons of others shall either be conscripted or asked to volunteer to compose this army.

How can the President police Turkey without sending an army? How can Armenia be protected without military force?

While plans are being made to send an American army to Turkey and another to Siberia and still another to Germany, how can the President tell the American people that if the league of nations is adopted no khaki-clad troops will ever again cross the Atlantic? While he is telling the people of his audiences that if the league of nations is adopted no khaki-clad troops will ever again cross the Atlantic, at the moment he is making the statement to them he is engaged in enlisting and organizing and transporting khaki-clad troops across the Atlantic to serve in Siberia and in Germany in performance of the obligations which will be imposed upon us under the league of nations.

If armies are now being raised to be sent to Siberia and to Germany, if another army is to be raised to police Turkey under plans now being made, how are we to be able to perform our obligations in Mexico? Will it be necessary to raise still another army for that purpose?

When at this moment American soldiers are being enlisted under the authority of the President for service in Siberia and in Germany under the league of nations how can the President say that it is a peace league? To how many other places in Europe, Asia, and Africa are American soldiers to be sent in the performance of the duties that will devolve upon us under the league of nations?

What is to be the cost of all these armies?

How is the money to be raised?

How are the men to be obtained and of what ages are they to be, what classes are to be called, and what classes exempt from this service?

It may be interesting to the American people to know the details of the military service which they will be called upon to perform in all parts of the world.

If it be said, however, that no soldiers are to be sent to Europe under the league of nations, how can the armies that we are now raising for Germany and Siberia be maintained there without the consent of the league of nations?

If no soldiers are to be sent to Europe or Asia in the performance of our duties under the league of nations, then what are we to do under the league of nations? The duties that will devolve upon us under the league of nations are duties in Europe. They consist of the government of those portions of Europe which are involved in the disputes between various European nations in regard to boundaries, after-the-war settlements, and the establishment of new governments.

How is the Government of the United States to perform these proposed obligations there unless it has soldiers there?

I should like the President or anybody who is interested in that question to explain it to the people, and I think that in fairness that ought to be done.

If no soldiers are to be sent to Europe or Asia in the performance of our duties under the league of nations, if we are to do nothing under the league of nations, then why join the league of nations?

If, as the President says, we are to depend on blockades and destructive economic isolation, will not that be a sure cause of war?

Will blockades, social ostracism, and economic isolation, as prescribed by the President, tend to make any nation peaceable?

If the President thinks, as he says, that Lenin is so despicable, why did the President eulogize his terms of peace at the treacherous conference at Brest-Litovsk?

Why did the President, both before and after we entered the war, attempt to bring about peace on the same terms as proposed by Lenin?

Why was the President, as was Lenin, for peace without victory, as he declared both before and after we entered the war?

For what reason does the President propose we should grant independence to the Philippines and assume a mandate over Armenia?

On what theory or policy does the President refuse to preserve order in Mexico and undertake to do it in Siberia and Germany?

The President says that if we reject the league we will be "contemptible quitters." What would we be quitting?

He says we must "stay with the game." What is "the game" and when will the game be finished, if it is not finished now?

He says we won the war for France and England, and, having won it, it would be dishonorable for us now to abandon them. How did winning the war for France and England put us under obligation to them or to the rest of Europe? Is it not the truth that the service we rendered Europe in the war puts Europe under obligation to us instead of putting us under obligation to Europe?

Would our people ever have voted for war if they had foreseen that after they had won it the President would tell them it would be dishonorable for them to come home and to bring our armies home?

If the President thinks the league of nations would be a benefit to the United States, why did he say at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York on March 5 that it would be a supreme sacrifice? If it is a supreme sacrifice, as he said it was, is he not violating his oath of office in attempting to impose it on the American people?

Will the President deny that the covenant of the league of nations gives the supervision of our trade in arms to the league, while the Constitution of the United States gives it to Congress and through Congress to the people of the United States?

Is it not true that the covenant of the league of nations provides that when the size of the armies and navies has been fixed as therein provided it can not be increased without the consent of the league, while the Constitution gives Congress the absolute power to raise armies and navies?

Is it not true that the covenant obligates us to defend the territorial integrity of all the proposed members of the league? How could we defend territorial integrity without war?

What voice do our people have in such a war, provided for in advance by the league of nations, if we are to keep our obligations under the league?

Is it not true that every question likely to lead to a rupture is to be decided by the league, and that we are bound to obey its decisions? Does not this involve every interest of the United States, without exception, in this decision?

Does not Great Britain with her colonies have six votes in the body of delegates while the United States has only one? Why should Great Britain have six times as many votes as the United States?

Does not Hejaz have as many votes in the assembly of delegates as the United States? Why should Hejaz or Haiti or Liberia each have as many votes as the United States in the body of delegates of the league of nations? That is what the covenant of the league of nations provides.

The President says limitation of armament can not be obtained without the league of nations. That is what the President says. Is that so? If that is so, how is it that we have already and have had for many years limitation of armament between the United States and Canada without a league of nations? If we can not have limitation of armament without a league of nations, how does it occur that you can travel for 3,000 miles along the boundary between the United States and Canada without seeing a fort or a soldier?

Does not the President himself say also that disarmament can only come by international conference and agreement?

Can we not have international conference and agreement without a league of nations? Of course, these questions answer themselves. I am only submitting them to call attention to the facts. Everybody knows that we can have a conference between nations about a limitation of armaments without having a league of nations. If it is desired to have an agreement between the United States and other nations to bring about disarmament or a limitation of armaments, the natural, common-sense way to go about it would be to call such a conference and have that conference devise some plan of disarmament or limitation of armaments.

The President says there is an international agreement for disarmament in the league of nations. I think he made that statement a number of times—that there is an international agreement for disarmament or for a limitation of armaments in the league of nations. Without desiring to dispute the President's statement too categorically or to seem offensive, I wish to say there is no such provision in the covenant of the league of nations—none whatever. It was not even attempted by the delegates or representatives who framed the league of nations to devise any plan for disarmament or limitation of armaments, which the President says is contained in it. There was no effort made for that purpose. They were there long enough to do it. If those delegates were really in favor of a limitation of armaments, it looks as though they could have arrived at a plan or program for it during the seven months they were in session; but they did not try to do it, and there is nothing in the covenant of the league of nations to that effect.

The covenant of the league of nations provides that after the league of nations is adopted, if it shall ever be adopted, then the league of nations—not the nations acting individually in conference, but the league of nations by the council that gathers in Geneva—shall proceed within some time in the unknown future to devise a plan for a limitation of armaments.

There is some dispute as to whether or not when that plan has been devised it shall take effect at once upon the dixit of the league or whether it will have to be ratified by the several nations. There is, however, no dispute whatever, because there can not be any, that if such a plan should ever be carried out, and the size of the armies and the size of the navies of the different countries should be fixed as of that date, with reference to conditions that are existing then, the United States, through its Congress and its President, could never increase its Army and could never build another battleship without getting the consent of the league of nations.

If the American people desire that, if they are able under the Constitution to humiliate themselves by subjecting the control of their Military Establishment, which is necessary for the defense of the Nation, to the absolute domination of a foreign congerie of powers, why, of course, they would have no one to blame. Before it is done, however, the American people at least ought to have an opportunity of voting upon the question; I do not mean to say by having the specific question submitted to them at an election, but having it submitted to them in the ordinary way in which the American people are accustomed to decide the great issues of the Government; having it set forth in platforms by political parties and in statements of principles by candidates who submit themselves for election. Then, if the American people, after it has been discussed in the rural schoolhouses as well as in the great cities, in the local neighborhoods as well as on a tour of the President in a great special train, surrounded by an army of publicity agents—when the people have had an opportunity to understand and to consider the thing in its exact form and in the consequences which it will have upon the control of our country, if they want to say that the increase of their Army and the increase of their Navy can not be effected until they get the permission of the council of a league of nations sitting in Geneva, perhaps they would have no cause of complaint.

The council of the league of nations must be unanimous, according to the covenant. So under the terms of this instrument, if it is adopted in its exact form as the President demands, Japan can say to the United States, "You can not increase your Army; we will not vote for it." Japan can say, "You must get our consent before you increase your Army or your Navy." I should like the President to discuss that question on the Pacific coast. No doubt he will. I do not think he can dispute the statement of fact which I have made, for it is written in specific language in the covenant of the league of nations.

If this question should be referred to the body of delegates, Hejaz and a sufficient combination of little powers constituting the various protégés and allies of Great Britain and the other European powers, whose influence has been predominant in the formation of the league, can say that the United States can not increase its Army or its Navy without getting their consent.

Does the President claim that the plan for the limitation of armaments which the league is to provide is to be binding on the nations without their consent? That is not very clear in the covenant. Does the President claim that as soon as the league of nations has agreed upon it, it shall be binding? If it is not binding, then how is it to be established except by conference and consent? And if it is not to be established except by conference and consent, a league of nations is wholly superfluous and unnecessary. If the league of nations' decision, on the other hand, is to be binding on the nations without their consent, then the President should say so. If that is the President's view, he should so declare. Then we would know that we are to become a subject people.

But how can the President tell the people of the United States—and I only mention the President because of the extraordinary debating tour in which he is now engaged—how can he or anyone else tell the people that there will be a limitation of armaments under the league when he knows, and everybody else who is familiar with the proceedings knows, that Great Britain, which has six votes to our one in the league of nations, has already decreed that league or no league the predominance of her sea power will be maintained? How are we going to have a limitation of armaments under that fiat? What is the purpose of telling the people that the object here is to obtain a limitation of armaments when it is known that even before the league is adopted the consideration of the limitation of the British armament, that power by which she has ruled the seas and through her command over the seas has ruled a large portion of the world, has been withdrawn by Great Britain even from the consideration of the league of nations?

Now, Mr. President, I wish to submit another question. There is an assumption by many of its advocates that the league of nations is going to stand for peace, for righteousness, for justice in the international affairs of the world. How is the stand of the league of nations to be determined? It is to be determined by the council of the league of nations. What is the council of the league of nations? It is a little body, a little handful of astute international statesmen gathered at some point in Europe and vested with the mighty powers of the league of nations. Why does the President, why does anybody, assume that this little council, far removed from the people whose fortunes are in their hands, are going to be for peace or that they will direct the affairs of the league of nations for peace? Why is it assumed that they are going to be righteous men with no evil in their hearts? Why is it assumed that they will not be controlled by the selfish interests of the nations they represent? Did anybody ever see an international statesman whose actions were not controlled by such motives? Is there anything in history to justify the assumption that they are going to be always good and never bad? Is it not true, on the contrary, that every centralized world power has been tyrannical and oppressive and that every council representing such a league has been swayed by selfish interests, rent by factional strife, and corrupted by ambition? That is the experience of the world. That is the observation of human nature. Why is it assumed that the men who are to compose this council of a league of nations are going to be regenerated from the vices of the world and become entirely virtuous?

The Monroe doctrine was established on the principle that Europe should not participate in the control of American affairs. I have tried to state in simple language, but in correct analysis, this great governing principle of our foreign policy—the principle that Europe should not participate in the control of American affairs, and its corollary, that America should not participate in the control of European affairs. That is the Monroe doctrine in simple form and in complete form. How can the President honestly tell the people that a world league founded on the principle that Europe shall participate in the control of American affairs, and that America shall participate in the control of European affairs, does not abrogate the Monroe doctrine? If the covenant of the league expressly provides that the things forbidden by the Monroe doctrine shall be done, what good will it do to stipulate that it shall not interfere with the Monroe doctrine? You can put all the stipulations that you can write into the instrument and they will have no effect, because the body of the instrument is founded on the participation by America with the other members of the league in the control of European affairs, and the participation of the other members of the league in Europe and in Asia in the control of American affairs; and when you have provided that you have uprooted the Monroe doctrine, and it is withered and dead, and it never can breathe again the breath of life.

The ancient and modern policy of America, from Washington and Jefferson down, has been to keep ourselves free from foreign entanglements. How can the President honestly tell the people that a league of nations which obligates us to participate in every important European quarrel is not a violation of these ancient principles? I think he has told them that; but how can he do it? Under these unwritten laws of our foreign policy we have grown great, we have been free, prosperous, and happy, and we have been able to render valuable service to the world under these ancient muniments of our foreign policy. Why does the President suppose that our condition would be improved, or our ability to render service to the world would be increased, by an abandonment of these policies?

The President said on the 5th of March in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York:

> We must join our fortunes with the fortunes of men everywhere.

That was the language of the President. Now, I should like the President, referring to that statement that he made on the 5th of March, to tell the people on this trip that he is making how we can join our fortunes with the fortunes of Japan, Turkey, Bulgaria, Italy, and the British dominions, and at the same time while we are doing that keep our fortunes independent of theirs? And if we can not keep our fortunes independent of theirs after we have joined ours to theirs, we are then in a state of foreign control of our own fortunes.

It is not so long, Mr. President, since our fathers made their desperate but successful struggle to free our States from a union with European powers. When the President now utilizes the powerful and almost immeasurable influence of his great office to bring about the formation of a union with European powers, is he not desecrating the memory of the fathers of the Nation? Is he not betraying the most sacred trust of his office?

The President has said that Germany would not have invaded Belgium if there had been a league of nations. Does he not know that there was a league of nations and a formal covenant for the integrity of Belgium, and that it was treated as a scrap of paper? Why does he assume that in such an emergency his league will not be treated as a scrap of paper?

The President says that Germany would not have invaded Belgium if she had known that the United States would intervene. What prevented the United States from intervening? The President says that if the United States had been obligated to intervene there would have been no Great War, and if this is so the lives of 50,000 American soldiers would have been saved. What prevented the United States from intervening. Is it not true that President Wilson himself prevented us from intervening in order that he might make a campaign for the Presidency on the cry, "He kept us out of war"?

Both Germany and the United States were parties to The Hague convention, which guaranteed the inviolability of neutral States. Why did not the President protest against this violation of that convention to which we were a party and to which Germany also was a party? Did you ever hear any protest that he made against it while flagrant violations of its provisions were going on and while the President was in control of the foreign affairs of this Nation? What reason is there to suppose that in a future emergency we may not again have a President who will quietly submit to a violation of the covenant of the league of nations and content himself with the proud boast that "We are too proud to fight"? A show of force and some proof of self-respect might have saved Belgium. Was the President prevented from acting because he did not have a league of nations? We were asked to join the league of nations opposed to Germany and refused. If a league of nations has the miraculous power of preserving peace in and of itself, why did not the President accept the appeal of France and Great Britain, join the existing league of nations for the great emergency, and preserve the peace of the world?

We were free then to act to save mankind and ourselves. In order to do it we did not have to have a league of nations, established 50 years before by people who are dead and gone, to govern our actions when the war with Germany broke out. Our fathers had been wiser than that. They had left the Government so that we, in this generation, when we were confronted by the emergency, when we were the ones to furnish our sons and to pay the treasure that was necessary to carry on the war, would have the power to control our action and our destiny. We could control it in such a way as we saw fit under the forms of government which existed; and the President—this same President who is now speaking—was at the head of the Government, in charge under the Constitution, with the initial control of the foreign relations of the Nation. We could have joined the league if it would have had the effect that he says it would.

I may pause to remark, as I have often remarked before, I think, that Mr. Henry Van Dyke, an estimable gentleman, former minister to Holland, was commissioned by Mr. Balfour, in charge of the foreign relations of the British Government when the Great War broke out, to hasten to the United States and appeal to President Wilson to throw in the fortunes of this great Republic with the fortunes of those nations which stood in the breach of civilization. Did the President think so well of a league of nations when the time for action came? Apparently not, because he rejected the appeal. He allowed the war to go on and the slaughter to continue, which, he says, could have been prevented. We were free then to save mankind, and perhaps it could have been done by the economic pressure and the social strangulation which the President suggests.

We are free now to so act, and we will be free unless we transfer our allegiance to the league of nations to control our affairs; we will be free to so act if we deem it in the interest of the American people and of mankind in the future.

What change is to be made in this condition by the league of nations? Is our independence of action in a matter involving the life of the Nation to be surrendered to the council and the body of delegates of the league of nations? If that is so, the President is under a sacred obligation to the people of this country to tell them so before he places this yoke upon them. If that is not so, then for what purpose is the league of nations?

The President says, in his stately style, "Put up or shut up"; accept the league of nations or offer a substitute for it. The opponents of the league of nations offer as a substitute for it the Constitution of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, and Lincoln's "government by the people." That is the substitute for a league of nations.

The President offers us a government by a council in Geneva, and says, "You must take it if you have nothing better to offer." It is not a question of having anything better to offer. The question is whether there is anything worse that could be offered. It is as though one were offered a dose of deadly poison and told that he must drink it to the dregs unless he could propose some alternative. The natural alternative would be not to drink it. He would probably suggest that immediately.

When Washington was sharing the sufferings of his men in the gloomy winter of Valley Forge there was no doubt in his mind as to the alternative for a union with a European power. Washington's alternative was to sever the union. That was what he was fighting for. That is what he and his soldiers suffered for, and that is what is involved in this issue before the American people to-day.

Now, when a European union is again proposed the alternative is to reject the proposal and pillory the man who proposes it. If a rattlesnake is about to strike you, would the President ask what alternative you have to propose? The alternative is to kill the rattlesnake. When the President asks this question, does he not know that the alternative to the wars for which he is even now enlisting American boys to be carried on in Asia and Europe under the league of nations, the hate they will engender, the burdens of taxation on the backs of the poor, the bereft parents of these sons, the widows and orphans of those who would carry out the mandate of the league of nations on a fool's errand in Asia, the supreme sacrifice of all this, as the President characterizes it—does he not know that the alternative to all of this misery and folly is the peace which we have earned in a victorious war that is now finished?

Will he not be frank and tell the people that the "old order," of which he said at Suresnes we were ashamed, brought us the supreme happiness of mankind. If the President is ashamed of our past, as he says he is, does he not know that our people are not ashamed of it? Does he not know that the alternative which we have to offer for the international ill will which the league of nations, even in its formation, has created is the peace and honest friendship with all nations which, with few intervals, we have enjoyed since the foundation of the Government? Why does the President say we must adopt the league of nations or live in isolation from the rest of the world? Why does he say that? That is what he says. The President of the United States, on a tour to explain the league of nations to the people, says, "Adopt this instrument or live in isolation from the rest of the world if you do not adopt it." No doubt everyone has read that statement. It has been repeated over and over again. It is one of the favorite arguments for the league of nations.

It is not possible, however, that the President thinks that. The President is familiar with the past experience of this Nation, and during all of this time when we have been growing great, enjoying the blessings of liberty which we inherited from our fathers, we had no league of nations; it was anathema to the great leaders, the greatest who ever lived in this or any other country, the statesmen who founded this Nation upon the natural rights of man, and preserved, through Lincoln, government by the people, to entangle ourselves with European affairs in a league of nations. We had none. And when, during all that period, did we ever live in isolation from the rest of the world? He says we must live in isolation from the rest of the world or have a league of nations. We have lived to the present time without a league of nations, and we have never been for one moment of that time in isolation from the rest of the world. The man who says so is deceiving the people.

On the contrary, without any league of nations, we have maintained intimate economic and social relations with all the civilized world. No one knows better than the President that we will continue to do so without the league of nations, unless the animosities engendered during his stay in Paris, by his effort to dictate the affairs of other people in which we had no concern, should bring about such isolation. Why does the President say that a league of nations would prevent war? That is another statement that I have heard, that the league of nations will prevent war. A great many people are for the league of nations because the President has told them that the league of nations would prevent war. They have a just and proper respect for the authority of the President.

Would this league of nations, if we had had it, have prevented our Civil War? If so, will the President point out how it would have done so? Would the other members of the league have intervened, or applied their economic boycott, which the President so humanely recommends, in favor of the Federal or the Confederate States? If so, what would have been the result, unless it had been to plunge the whole world into war? Was not that, as a matter of fact, a war between the members of a Federal union; and if so, what is to prevent a war between the members of a league? Has not the President already succeeded, I ask deliberately, in dividing the league into factions, by forming a league within the league, which restores at one stroke the old balance of power, and arrays one against the other? That is in the league of nations. Does not the division of this league into rival groups at one stroke negative and destroy the whole principle and theory of a harmonious league of all nations, in which the hostile array of one group of nations against another was to be obliterated?

The President says a league of nations will prevent war. We can only judge the future by the past. There was a league of nations in 1914. It did not prevent the German war. Would the league of nations have prevented our war for independence? He says it will prevent war. Would it have prevented that? If so, will the President point out how it would have prevented it?

The President says he desires to prevent all wars. Does he regret the war by which we gained the freedom he would sacrifice? Would he have had a league of nations to prevent that war? If so, he would have deprived mankind of the greatest blessing it has received in the long struggle up from barbarism.

Would he have a league of nations that would prevent such a war for freedom in the future? If so, if that is his object and purpose he is setting up the most monstrous obstacle to the progress of man that the reactionary forces of the devil could devise.

But the President may say that a league of nations would have so operated that no cause would have been given to the Colonies to wage a war for independence. Would the President have desired that result? There were many then, and there are many now, who would have desired it. But even so there are thousands who thank God that there was a cause and that there were mighty men who preferred national independence, even at the price of war, to a league of nations.

What other wars would it have prevented? Will the President advise the people that the league of nations would have prevented our war with Great Britain in 1812 for our rights upon the seas? If so, how? Would it have been by the sacrifice of those rights; would it have been by blighting in its infancy that maritime development which was one of the chief factors in the story of our growth? Or would a league of nations have preserved the freedom of the seas? Why does the President think that in any such case the league of nations would protect our rights upon the seas as against the claims of Great Britain? Certainly it would not do so if Great Britain had 6 votes to our 1 in the body of delegates, and was in secret or open special alliance with a dozen others, and in addition to that had the votes of such dependencies as Hedjaz, Portugal, and others that might be named. Furthermore, how does the President suppose that such a league would have prevented our War of 1812 for the freedom of the seas by maintaining the freedom of the seas when the freedom of the seas has already in advance been excluded from consideration by the league by those who will be in control of it?

What other wars in which we have been engaged would have been prevented by the league of nations? Would the league of nations have prevented us from going to the rescue of Cuba from the cruel clutch of Spain? Would the President's league of nations have corrected the abuses of Weyler and others, which became an offense to the world? It would not have corrected the abuses, because Mr. Wilson tells us it can not interfere with the domestic affairs of any nation. It would have prevented the United States from coming to the rescue, because every member would have obligated itself to preserve the territorial integrity of the members of the league. Will the President tell us if it is not true that in such a case his league would be obligated to bring to bear upon us its pleasant process, which he has described so often, of social ostracism and economic strangulation, and to supplement this, if necessary, by force of arms, if it fulfilled its obligation to preserve the territorial integrity of Spain; and would all this have been for the sake of enforcing peace by making war in behalf of a brutal despotism and to prevent aid from reaching a people struggling for freedom? Will Mr. Wilson tell the people, with intellectual honesty, that that is not the working and the purpose of the league to enforce peace? Cuba, smiling in the Caribbean, may thank God that freedom came to her before the blight of such a league of nations fell upon the world.

Mr. Lawrence says "the President makes an open bid for the support of the Irish by hinting that America can not intrude upon England's affairs now, but that under a league of nations Ireland can get a hearing and the moral support of the United States."

The Irish case is not our case, but it may be suggested that the Irish will belie their racial brightness if they are caught by any such gull bait as that. They would be more credulous than those who were caught by the President's molasses-to-catch-flies speech on the Panama Canal. The idea that any right claimed by Great Britain can be invaded by appealing to the league of nations which she created, and which she and her allies will dominate, will be as futile as China's plea for her people to this same league of nations. China was told to leave her case to the peace conference.

The Chinese delegation desired to retain an American lawyer to represent the Chinese Republic in the protection of her great and strategic Province of Shantung. They were told by the American delegation not to employ a lawyer, to leave it to them. The Chinese delegation wanted to file a brief of their case on Shantung. They were told by the American delegation not to file a brief, to leave it to them. They left it to them, as the President tells the Irish to leave the Irish question to them, and the league of nations took care of the rights of Shantung in this vital matter by turning their rights over to Japan. That is the way they took care of them.

The control of Shantung means the control of China under the conditions which exist there. There is a good deal of misapprehension about the importance of the Shantung question. The control of the Shantung railway, which forms a junction with the main arterial north and south railway from Shanghai to Peking, is the control of the transportation of China. It is the military, strategic, dominating point on the Chinese coast. America is interested in that question because of well-known issues between certain peoples in the Orient and the United States, which we have been dodging for a good while, but which one of these days we will have to confront. We can not keep on dodging them.

The control of Shantung, and through the control of Shantung, the control of China, has a vital interest for the United States as well as for Japan and our ally China, whom we helped to rob and dismember in the peace conference, a peace conference composed of the same nations that are to compose and control the league of nations. But they say they are going to be good men, that they will not do anything wrong. And yet pretty nearly everything that they do is wrong. But there seems to be an imaginary future in which they are going to be regenerated, and although they are robbing China now, and they impress various people with the principle of self-determination and claim that in the future this league of nations is going to be righteous. That is just a picture that is just imaginary. You judge people by what they do, not by what they tell you they are going to do.

I met a man the other day in the corridor of the Capitol, an acquaintance of mine, who is almost a fanatic on the subject of the league of nations, and he began to denounce the Shantung outrage. "Oh," I said, "I thought you were in favor of the league of nations?" He said, "I am in favor of the league of nations." "Oh," I said, "you are in favor of the league of nations, but you do not like what the league of nations does. Is that it?" He admitted that was the situation.

I do not understand how people can be for an institution when they disapprove of the principal things that the institution effects.

President Wilson said in his speech the other day at one of the cities in which he was speaking, that we could not have prevented France and England from giving Shantung, the Chinese Province where the grave of their old leader and mentor of centuries, Confucius, is located, to Japan. That may possibly be true, but if we could not prevent France and England from giving Shantung to Japan, that was not any reason why we should join with them and help to carry out the transaction and ourselves sign the guaranty. France and England had some excuse for their conduct. We did not have any at all. France and England had the excuse of secret treaties made in the desperate urgency of a war for their existence. France and England had been carrying on the war for their existence and for civilization for three years before the President was induced to cast in the influence of the United States on their side. That is why they made these treaties, or at least it was an incident of that war. They had some excuse, but we were not even in the war when the first steps toward these treaties were taken. We ought to have been in, but we were not. We were not bound by any such treaty, the President's excuse for the dismembering of our ally in the war. Previous to the time of those treaties that France and England made with Japan, one of the means by which France and England were trying to preserve their national existence in the desperate struggle in which they were engaged, what was the President doing? The President was trying at that time to bring about a peace while Germany was in possession of Belgium and northern France. The President shortly before those treaties were made was using the mighty influence of this Nation to bring about a peace without victory, which would have meant a German peace. Our situation was quite different from that of France and Great Britain on the Shantung question. We had no such justification. But even supposing that France and Great Britain had no excuse at all—and I am not saying that their excuse is sufficient, I am only relating the circumstances, it was an outrage in whatever light it is regarded—but suppose they had no excuse, when we see a gang of powerful burglars break into a house we may not be able to stop them, but that is not any reason why we should join them and help to burglarize the house. The argument that Japan would have a cause of complaint against us if we do not agree to the transaction is quite transparent. We are under no obligation to Japan in regard to Shantung, and yet it is said by writers and speakers of influence that if we do not sign this treaty giving Shantung to Japan, Japan will have cause for war against us. She will not have anything of the kind. We are under no obligation to sign that instrument. We never agreed to do it. Japan has no right to expect or to claim that we should do it. We are entirely free agents in the matter. The attempt to coerce and terrorize the public opinion of the United States on this great question by the false assertion that we are liable to have war with Japan or with France or with England if we do not join in the rape of China is a rank deceit attempted to be practiced upon the people. There is no such danger. There is no such condition.

The President says the league of nations will help China to get her rights back. How can the league of nations help her to get her rights back when the nations that control the league of nations are the very ones which have taken her rights and her province and the key to her empire from her.

But the President tells the good Presbyterians who are for the league of nations but against the rape of China that Japan has promised to give Shantung back to China. Who promised? What right did he have to promise, or to bind Japan? None whatever. The Japanese Government has made no such promise. Whoever it was that made such a promise, if there ever was such promise made, I should like to ask the President, if I may do so respectfully, did he say when Japan would give Shantung back to China? I have never yet heard any dates mentioned. The fact of the case is he expressly refused to say when they would give it back.

If President Wilson has a promise from anyone that Shantung will be restored to China within any definite time known to man, will he advise the people whom he is addressing on that subject when that time will arrive? That particular time will never arrive because there is no such particular time; it has not been designated, and the promise, if it was made, is perfectly worthless, in the first place, because the man who made it had no right to speak for the Japanese Government, and, in the second place, because the promise to do something when you do not fix a time for doing it amounts to nothing.

The President asks, Will we go to war with France and Great Britain for Shantung? Does the President think we will have to go to war with France and Great Britain if we keep our fingers out of this dirty business? In other words, did the President sign the agreement to give a part of China to Japan under compulsion, in order to keep the United States out of war with Japan, France, and Great Britain? How could there be a war as long as we are going to have a league of nations to enforce peace? Was it for the same reason we gave Great Britain equal rights with ourselves in our own Panama Canal? If it was not for that purpose what was the President's purpose in joining in the deed?

Does the language of the twenty-third article obligating the members of the league to provide for the free transit of the commerce of all the members mean free trade? If it does not mean free trade, what does it mean? If it means something else, why did the covenant not state what it means? Was it purposely left in this form, as a joker in the league, so that the free-trade countries of Europe, seeking an American market, could place their own interpretation upon this clause, so as to carry out the well-known free-trade policies of Col. House and President Wilson? Freedom of transit of commerce means freedom of transit of the commodities of commerce from the point of shipment to the point of destination, and in international shipments, referred to in this covenant, that means free trade.

The removal of economic barriers means free trade. That was in the 14 points of peace. Is the "freedom of transit of commerce" simply another and a higher stage of existence of this same bug? Did it have any relationship to the shipment of Texas cotton?

The President himself affords the strongest argument against the league. He said at Des Moines, Saturday, September 6, 1919, that our labor conference could not perform its functions until we know what is to be done with the peace treaty. He said at another time that the high cost of living was due to delay in ratifying the peace treaty, which contains the league of nations. The war has been over for 10 months; and yet the President says the settlement of our most vital social and economic problems is so tied up with Europe by this instrument that we can not settle them except in connection with this treaty. If the President has succeeded in so binding us to Europe by his half year's negotiations, that we can not hold a labor conference, or suppress Bolshevism—the President says we can not suppress Bolshevism unless we have a league of nations or reduce the high cost of living without the adoption of a league of nations—why, then, we should not delay a moment in freeing ourselves from the entanglement if we are tied up in that way.

According to the President our domestic economy is tied up in the peace treaty with Europe which he has brought back. If that is so the whole treaty should be rejected at once, and the economic independence of the Nation reasserted.

Will the President explain how the league of nations will reduce the cost of living? I understand he has said that it would. I should like to understand how it would. Will he point out in plain terms what the league of nations will have to do with a labor conference called to consider domestic labor conditions? If an international labor conference is desired can one not be called without having a league of nations? Will the President assert to the people that an international labor conference, supposing that such a conference is desirable, can not be called without the formation of a league of nations?

The President says intervention in Europe is an accomplished fact, and no longer open to debate. It is true we intervened in the German war because it was a menace to the United States. Our own vital interests were involved. If Germany had occupied France and then proceeded to conquer England, it would only have been the question of a brief time until she would have consolidated her resources and attacked the United States. There has been a good deal of idealistic talk about why we went into the German war. That is the reason we went into it. We went into it to save our independence. It was our duty to go into it to cooperate with those who were standing against Germany, while we had a chance to cooperate, in order that we would not have to stand against her alone. That is why we went into the German war. Remember that, when you hear talk about the alleged fact that we had no interest in this war and that we went into it as unselfish servants of mankind, we did go into it as servants of mankind, and we served mankind in the greatest way in which mankind could be served, by preserving this Republic as a beacon light for all the world.

It was the only emergency of the kind that has arisen since the Nation was founded. It was a special occasion. When we intervened we did so upon our own independent judgment as a Nation, the people and Government of the United States freely determining their course by existing circumstances, and not under compulsion of a bond executed beforehand, and not under the direction or coercion of a league of nations. The action of the United States was based on the vital interests of its people. The action of a league of nations would be based upon the interests of those who controlled the league. The proposed league would be wholly controlled by Europe and its Asiatic allies and dependencies. The action of the United States was determined by the interests of the people of the United States.

Such a European emergency, threatening civilization and menacing the independence of the United States, is not likely to arise again for 50 years. When it does arise, be it soon or late, are the people of the United States, of that generation, who will be required to submit their bodies and their treasure to meet the emergency, to be free to govern their own action according to the conditions which will then exist, and which we can not possibly foresee, or are they to be obligated in advance to enter the conflict under the direction of a league of nations or be confronted by the alternative of repudiating the bond which we of this generation placed upon them? Is the United States to bind itself in advance to participate in every European war because it participated in this one? Then by our victory, if that is the case, we have gained not peace but a heritage of war.

But the President says the league of nations is merely advisory. If it is merely advisory, how can it be a league to enforce peace? How can it be merely advisory if it has the power to coerce by economic strangulation, described in detail by the President in his recent speeches? If our obligations in the league are not contractual but moral and subject to our own discretion, as stated by the President, by what authority can the league undertake to enforce those obligations by embargoes and economic isolation? If the league is merely advisory and obedience to its decrees rests merely in the good judgment of its members, as the President states, then why have a league at all? Why not have merely an advisory council, if the league of nations is to be merely an advisory council?

But if the obligations of the members of the league are not merely discretionary, but contractual; if the instrument is really a constitution, as it was first called, or a covenant, as it is now called; if the council and body of delegates of the league have the power to enforce the decrees of the league by economic strangulation; if disobedience of its decrees constitutes an act of war; if "force is in the background," as the President says; if it is to have, as the covenant provides, supervision of the trade in arms and munitions of war; if the army or the navy of a member of the league can not be increased without the permission of the league, as the covenant covenants, however vital the emergency; if every demand or controversy that is made against the United States by any other nation, about any matter whatever, is to be submitted to the league for determination—if these things are true, as I assert they are true—then is it not a supergovernment?

If the league is merely advisory it is useless, because we can accomplish the purpose without a great institution of this kind by having an advisory council which you could write in six lines on a sheet of note paper. If it is mandatory, however, it is a despotism. I think that is a sound deduction of the alternative upon the differing constructions of the character of the league of nations. If it is to be merely advisory, we do not need it. If its powers are mandatory, then it is a despotism.

How can either the honor, the self-respect, the independence, or the material welfare of the United States continue to exist if Japan or Great Britain, by withholding the unanimous vote required in the council of the league, can deny permission to the United States to increase its Army or Navy, curb its power, and control its means of defense at sea? You may say that they do not intervene unless territory is attacked. How about rights at sea? No nation, however great, can continue prosperous unless it preserves its rights upon the great thoroughfares of commerce, upon the high seas of the world. What is said about that? Some of our wars have been fought about that. Suppose we have an international conflict or controversy about the safety of our commerce, the rights of our sailors, the freedom of our ships upon the great oceans, where we have as much right as any other nation has, where no nation is sovereign? If this league of nations can intervene about such a controversy, then it can control the destinies of this country.

How can the Nation continue to exist if Japan or Great Britain, by withholding the unanimous vote required in the league of nations, can prevent the protection of our citizens abroad and so suppress and control our status in the world? Such protection is essential to the dignity, the honor, the prosperity, and, I think, the existence of the Nation. It must not only protect its own territory, but the aegis of its laws should follow its citizens wherever they go, in the myriad paths of commerce, and give them that protection to which the laws of nations entitle them. If the league of nations has jurisdiction to determine disputes over such matters it will control the status of the United States in its relations to other nations throughout the world.

But, it is said, the nations that will control this league are our friends. Mr. President, there is no such thing as friendship in State affairs. They are our friends when it is to their interest to be our friends. Their own national interests, the commerce, the food, the prosperity of their own people, are of more concern to them than our interests, and from their standpoint it is proper that it should be so. Now, this of course is quite elementary, but it seems necessary in dealing with idealists to recall and set before them in very plain terms elementary principles.

But it is said that this council will be just and fair. Why is it supposed that they will be just and fair? The representatives of these nations sitting at the peace conference have not been so at all times. Why is it supposed that they will be more just or fair or generous when they get upon the council of the league of nations?

This is one of the illusions of the league fanatics. There is no reason to be found either in any observation of human nature or in the teachings of history to suppose that the men of state, sitting on the council of the league of nations, promoting the interests of their people, will be anything but crafty, shrewd, nationally selfish, and internationally cruel and despotic. Mr. Wilson found them so at the peace conference. Why has he the delusion that he will not find them so when he finds them invested with the veto powers of the league of nations?

The assumption that virtue has completely triumphed over evil in the hearts of international statesmen, and that the American people can trust their rights and liberties to the benevolence of the council of a league of nations is what President Wilson has so aptly described in referring to the result of others of his own acts, the "metaphysical tragedy of to-day." It cost the blood and tears of centuries to learn that the only safe protection of a people is to keep their government and the control of their vital interests in their own hands.

A former Government official of the United States advises his countrymen to ratify the league of nations without reservations. I am referring to a statement which was published in the newspapers a few days ago by a prominent former official of the Government, now out of office. He says we should sign this league of nations covenant just as it stands, without delay, and then that we immediately should send a delegation to the league of nations and appeal to them to protect the institutions of the United States. I say that the man who gives that advice to the people is a traitor to his country.

The Kaiser, the socialists, the communists, the anarchists, the Bolshevists, and a certain element of those who are in favor of a league of nations, are all internationalists. I do not know but that they all are, but I do not like to make it absolutely inclusive. There may be some advocates of the league of nations who think they are not internationalists, but most of them are internationalists. So is the Kaiser, so are the anarchists, so are the communists, so are the Bolshevists. They all believe in the doctrine of internationalism. They all favor—those that I have characterized—a central world authority based on force and overriding national lines.

Mr. President, is not such a centralized superauthority in its very nature a frightful despotism? They think it is liberty. I do not see how it could be, in its very nature, anything but a despotism. What reason or experience is there to assume that it is not? Frightful consequences would ensue from it if it is. Is it this internationalism that affords the explanation of the President's declaration that the day of seeking our national advantage has passed?

Under our form of government the majority rules. But the powers of even the majority are special and limited. Even the majority can not do everything. A conspicuous feature of our Constitution is the bill of rights, founded on the immortal charter of George Mason in the Virginia constitution, in which she established her independence from Great Britain, guarding and entrenching by express mention the rights of the individual. But this is not all. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." I recognize and submit to the rule of the majority subject to the munitions of liberty; but I do not recognize in the President, nor in Congress, nor in the majority, should such a majority ever exist, any authority to transfer by means of a world constitution, or a world covenant, my allegiance in any attribute of government from the United States to a combination of foreign powers.

This "covenant" of the league of nations, which we are discussing, is not a treaty. It is a constitution of government. It does not establish a condition to be dealt with by the independent action of the parties to the arrangement, as in the case of a treaty. It sets up an elaborately organized government outside of, separate, and apart from the Government of the United States. We have never had a treaty that ever did that. It invests this organization with vast governmental powers. It contains no bills of rights. It makes no reservation of powers not specifically granted. It undertakes to transfer to a permanent government in Europe powers which our people have vested in the President, in Congress, under their control.

No such new constitution of government, even if its powers were vested in our own Nation, could be established without a submission to the people or to the States. The imperious and autocratic demand of the President that it must be adopted in the exact form in which he has proposed it is too great a departure from our conception of freedom to receive consideration.

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am in favor of the pending bill. I shall therefore be brief in discussing the amendment I have to propose. Not only do I think that this bill should pass at an early date, but I am going to be one of those who will assist the majority here in preparing and passing at the earliest date the proper reconstruction measures that we ought to pass. Our country is in a perilous position. A wayfaring man can see that, and I believe he will serve his country well now, even though he be in the minority, as I am, if he will but honestly and fairly assist in passing the bills that are so necessary to stabilize the country. So I regard this measure as a constructive measure which should receive favorable action.

While this bill is important, and the business interests to which it relates are important to our country, it is not the only subject requiring attention. I want to take 10 minutes of the time of the Senate to call attention to another problem that presents itself for solution.

The United States has loaned to the allied and associated powers of the Great War over $10,000,000,000. These figures do not include the loan made, or alleged to have been made, last Saturday. I do not know the exact amount of that alleged loan. These figures I am about to read are four days old. We have loaned—

Belgium	$343,445,000.00
Cuba	10,000,000.00
Czechoslovakia	55,330,000.00
France	3,047,974,777.24
Great Britain	4,316,000,000.00
Greece	48,236,629.05
Italy	1,587,675,945.99
Liberia	5,000,000.00
Roumania	30,000,000.00
Russia	187,729,750.00
Serbia	26,780,465.56
Total	9,658,172,567.84

Mr. President, I am an optimist. My spectacles are always tinted with the hues of the rainbow. I instinctively and naturally see the pleasant side of all things, in war or peace. But optimist as I am, I doubt very much if thinking men believe that this money loaned to European powers is going to be paid back; at least paid back soon. I ask Senators to arise, if they think the European loans are going to paid back to us, and tell me who will repay, and when will be repaid, if at all, the loan we made to Russia? The morning papers announce that a further loan will be made to European Governments. Mr. President, we should be just as well as generous, we should be fair to our own people and just to them before we are generous to strangers.

Having loaned upward of $10,000,000,000 to these insolvent countries, we hesitate and pitiably flounder as to whether or not we will lend to our own soldiers $500,000,000, or one-third the amount we have already loaned to Italy. How can the American people think well of their Congress when we ladle out with a lavish hand $10,000,000,000 and threaten to ladle out $5,000,000,000 more to countries that may yet become our enemies, to countries that have not assisted us in any way, and then we deprive the American soldier of the opportunity to get a loan from his Government?

So, Mr. President, I shall offer an amendment to this bill which will provide that $500,000,000 shall be loaned to returned soldiers who wish to borrow. I am not going to insult the soldier by giving him anything; a man who walks uprightly and courageously does not want any gifts, any largess, or any bounties. Some time ago I took a modest part in securing the passage of an amendment to a bill granting a bonus of $60 to each honorably discharged soldier. I have received a few letters thanking me for such action, but I have received scores of letters from soldiers denouncing me for the insult I offered to the soldier in proposing to give him money. Make no mistake, the American soldier in this country is not an object of charity. He was not afraid of German gas, he was not afraid of hissing rockets and exploding shells. He wants to stand before the world as a man with no gift money in his pocket. But I voted for the bounty of $60 that was paid to the soldier and urged it in three speeches, and now I find that the soldier has a truer, larger conception of manhood than I have. He does not want any gifts or any charity, but he does feel that his Government should lend him money with which he can purchase a farm.

This amendment I am going to propose is the Mondell bill, which has been reported favorably by the House Committee on the Public Lands. I have simply taken the Mondell bill, already reported favorably from the Committee on the Public Lands of the House. I have not changed a word of it, because that bill has had the careful, deliberate consideration of a great committee of the House. They have heard the evidence, and they have reported the bill favorably. The bill provides, in substance, that the sum of $500,000,000 will ultimately be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and that working through the State land boards, working through the executive officers of the various States, loans may be made to soldiers who desire to procure them. It will be repaid in 40 years with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

Mr. President, I should like to see a roll call and see the Senator or the Representative who will stand up and say, "I have said nothing when billions were loaned to foreign Governments, but I voted 'No' when it came to lending my own soldiers money at 4 per cent interest."

This bill, I say, carefully safeguards the interests of the Treasury. It has been recommended by President Wilson. But possibly President Wilson is now so hotly pursued by partisan opponents that his recommendation amounts to little, though his recommendation has weight with me. But even if the President's recommendation should amount to nothing with some Senators, I call attention to the fact that Secretary Lane, one of the great statesmen of our country, one of the towers of strength in the Cabinet, recommends this bill.

Then some Senators may say, "While it is true that the President has recommended this bill, and Secretary Lane has recommended the bill, we fear it is partisan; we fear that it has not been investigated sufficiently."

I call attention to the fact that former President Roosevelt recommended this very bill. So upon all grounds I conclude that we ought to pay some attention to this measure. I hope, but I do not expect, that it will be adopted by the Senate at this particular time. I see the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands has come in. With his splendid leadership he has just put through a bill looking to the unlocking of our coal lands that have been tied up 10 years. I hope the Senator will convene his committee and bring into the Senate a bill providing for loans to soldiers. And I repeat here, because the Senator was out when I stated it before, if we can lend to Russia $187,000,000, why can we not lend $500,000,000 to our own soldiers?

I believe in being generous with those who have been just and generous with us. This money we are giving to Russia and Liberia and Bulgaria has been earned by the toil of the American people; it has been extracted from their pockets by taxation laws, and let us begin now the policy of being just to the American people before we are generous to anybody else.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago, and I repeat, that the returned soldier is in favor of this bill. I call attention to the fact that at the St. Louis caucus of the American Legion, which was held last May, a resolution was introduced proposing to give to each returned soldier six months' pay. A debate was had, and that resolution was unanimously defeated, and in the course of the discussion young Theodore Roosevelt said he was opposed to the six months' bounty, because the soldiers who saved this Government did not propose "to take anything out of the Government, but to put something into the Government." That statement by young Roosevelt sounded like a bugle call from the Mighty Hunter who reached the end of the long trail on the 6th of last January. "We are here not to take something out of the Government, but to put something in." Reflect on that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for information. I am not very familiar with the amendment which the Senator is about to offer to the pending measure. Is the loan which is proposed to be made to the soldier conditioned upon his entering on the public domain?

Mr. ASHURST. No; it is not. The Senator will pardon me if I give an extended reply. As I said, I took the so-called Mondell bill, which has been reported favorably to the House of Representatives and which proposes ultimately to appropriate $500,000,000, and the money will be spent through the agencies of the executive departments of the various States. For instance, a returned soldier in Vermont desires to obtain a farm in Vermont. Under the bill the Government will advance him money to purchase the farm if he wishes to. A returned soldier in Florida wishes to drain some of the swamp lands in his State. He may obtain a loan from his Government at 4 per cent, repayable in 40 years, to reclaim those lands.

There is, of course, an idea that the western arid and irrigable lands, of which we have a vast area, will be reclaimed, and that the water will be stored and put upon them. But the bill in no sense limits its operations to the arid and irrigable lands. In other words, there will be about $10,000,000 that will be available to each State to lend to the soldiers. It is intended that the soldier will get the benefit of what we call the increment. Instead of having to pay for the increment, he would become the beneficiary of it; he would reap the benefit of the growing value by taking raw lands where possible.

Mr. CUMMINS. This money is not to be loaned, then, directly to the soldier? It is to be expended in the interest of the soldier by the several States?

Mr. ASHURST. Upon such particular land as the soldier may wish. It is my judgment that in the operation of this bill the soldier could identify a tract of land in Iowa, Arizona, Texas, Florida, or Pennsylvania, or any other State.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the soldier wanted to go into some other business than agriculture. Why should not the Government lend him money for that purpose as well as for agriculture?

Mr. ASHURST. I agree with the Senator that it should. As I say, I think the bill grants ample authority, although I may not be correct about that. I am in favor of that, and would not oppose an amendment to that effect. It makes land the basis of the loan. I think I would support such an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is for the benefit of the soldier and not for the benefit of any particular vocation or calling. So I can not see why, if we are going to do this for the soldier in order to enable him to become a more efficient member of society, we should not extend the privilege to any kind of safe enterprise into which a soldier might desire to enter.

Mr. ASHURST. The suggestion of the Senator is apparently irresistible; that is, there seems to be no answer, and standing alone there is no answer to it. My judgment is that that would better be put in a separate and independent bill, because the problem of all nations from the time of the wars of Cæsar down to this very hour has been how to get the soldier back into community life. After the Revolutionary War there was such a vast domain lying west and north of the Ohio River awaiting the settler that the soldier could find land easily, and after the Civil War there was a mighty migration of discharged soldiers that built up the plains and the Western States. But now since we have not very much public land left that is desirable unless reclaimed, that would raise crops without irrigation or some improved and scientific methods of farming, it has been deemed wise by those who have investigated to enact such a law.

But the point I want to emphasize here to-day is that $10,000,000,000 have been loaned to foreign governments, and yet we are told in the public prints and elsewhere that the bill providing for the loan of half a billion dollars to our soldiers is in peril.

Mr. CUMMINS. The difficulty is, as I see it, that the bill would provide for a loan to possibly one-fiftieth or one-twentieth part of all our soldiers and the remaining forty-nine fiftieths or nineteen-twentieths would receive no benefit whatever from it. That, it seems to me, would be rather a serious discrimination between men who were equally brave and equally patriotic.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; it would be. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill provides for the purchase and ultimate ownership of a house in the city. This is my information, that the Mondell bill provides for a home settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ASHURST. I will stand corrected if the bill does not provide for that, but the policy of this legislation was to deal with soldier settlements, to get them into the world of production. There is a widespread outcry against the high cost of living. The high cost of living, of course, is the inevitable, the natural, result of a long war. The high cost of living is a phenomenon which has made itself manifest after every great war, because during the war so many millions of men are withdrawn from civil life, from the industrial and productive world, and put into the destructive world. The result after a long war is a scarcity of foodstuffs and inevitably a rise in prices.

The best way, in my judgment, to bring about a lowering of the high cost of living is to increase the supply as well as to eliminate the profiteer.

So I repeat that, while that might apparently only furnish soldiers, 1 out of every 50, a farm, the money would not be spent unless it were necessary to be spent. If the soldier did not wish to avail himself of the use of it, the money would not be spent. I presume Russia or perhaps Bulgaria would get it, or we might send some of it to Turkey.

However, as I say, I have no objection to an amendment of that sort, and if the Senator sees fit to offer it I will vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want Senators to understand from what the Senator from Arizona says that that is the sentiment of the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The security that would have to be required in a case of that kind is not provided for under the provisions of the bill, and, in fact, that theory is entirely different from the theory of the bill to which the Senator is referring.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], with the permission of the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the theory of this bill to give employment to the soldier and at the same time get the soldier on the land. It is following after the plans that were adopted years ago, known as the reclamation of arid lands. A soldier ultimately will have to pay back to the Government, with 4 per cent interest, every dollar advanced to him. The security provided for is the land itself, which will include the increased value of the land, with all improvements. The lands are open to entry to-day, and any citizen of the United States could make an entry upon them if it was possible to secure water to cultivate them as required by law, and, after a certain length of residence thereon and certain improvements, would be entitled to a patent to the land so entered.

The theory of the bill is to reclaim such land by providing storage water and thus provide homes for our returning soldiers. Reclamation projects similar to those created in the past under the reclamation act will be constructed to conserve the flood water, impound it, and then distribute that water upon arid land and make it as fertile land as will be found anywhere in the world. The advances for these purposes will be apportioned to the acreage under the project, and the soldier who goes upon a project under the bill has a right to employment in the construction of the works, and that will enable him to meet his first payment; that is, 10 per cent will be reserved under the bill which I introduced for the purpose of assisting in the first payment upon the land when the project is completed. The advances made are limited to certain improvements. All the advances are made to enhance the value of the land, so that every dollar that the soldier puts upon the land improves its value, and the Government securities in that way enhance every time an acre of land is plowed and by every dollar that the soldier puts upon his place, and instead of being worth, when the payments are all made, $4,000, if that is the maximum amount drawn by him, no doubt the place will be worth twice that amount, with his home and his improvements upon it.

The bill provides that these payments, if it becomes necessary, shall extend over a period of 40 years. But remember that the soldier is paying all the time 4 per cent upon all the deferred payments, and the Government in the end will receive every dollar that is advanced. That is a short explanation.

Mr. ASHURST. I want to thank the Senator. His explanation is more lucid than my statement, because he is more familiar with the bill than I am.

Mr. SMOOT. That explanation applies to the arid lands of the West. Then, the benefit applies to cut-over lands in the Northwest, and it also provides for the reclamation of swamp lands, and the Senator knows there are millions of acres of those lands in the United States that ought to be reclaimed, and will some time or other be reclaimed. This bill provides for the reclamation of such lands.

The theory of the bill is, and it so states, that there shall be at least one of these projects in each State, so that the amount of the money expended shall not be put in any one particular section of the United States, but shall cover the East, the West, the South, and the North.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if there is a drainage project contemplated in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. There is, and there is a provision that allowance shall be made to a soldier for his work for the drainage of the swamp lands, just as there is a provision for assisting in the impounding of water to be used upon the arid lands. There is a provision, also, for the pulling of stumps on stump land, but I will say to the Senator that in some sections of the country it is going to cost at least $125 to $150 an acre to pull those stumps, but when pulled the land will become very valuable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had just enough information about the bill to prompt my inquiry to the Senator from Arizona, and the remarks just made by the Senator from Utah confirm the impression I had generally of the bill. It is really not a bill which assists or extends aid by way of a loan to soldiers. The primary purpose of the bill is to bring under cultivation a greater area of land than is now in use. That is a very worthy purpose, but I am very much afraid that in tempting the soldier into the enterprise involved in either draining land or irrigating land or occupying cut-over land, instead of relieving him in any way or putting him in a position in which he may be a productive member of society, we are, in fact, imposing a very great burden upon him if he yields to the temptation to take the land.

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me say there that if the American soldier could face the German gas and shells and cooties that had military training, he will be willing to face a little American soil if he thinks it will develop into a home; and if he can obtain a home in his own country, he will face those hardships.

Mr. CUMMINS. For my part, if we desire to do this thing in an effective way and for the benefit of the soldier, I would much rather offer to loan to the soldier a sum of money that would enable him to buy a farm in North Dakota, the eastern part of it anyhow, or a farm in Iowa, Illinois, or Wisconsin, than to hold out this glittering generality that there is a fortune in irrigated lands.

Mr. ASHURST. You are not holding out to the soldier a false promise. Only 20 years ago there were lands in the West, not only in my State but in other States, raw lands that were dreary, that could be purchased for $2 or $3 an acre or even for a lower price than that, and after intelligent effort and water had been applied to them, we find they have a value of at least $200 an acre. There is an abundance of that sort of land left.

Mr. CUMMINS. I realize that, Mr. President, and no one can exceed me in the hope that all these lands may be reclaimed; I think they ought to be reclaimed; but we have had enough experience to know that it is not a poor man's project. It is rich land, I am aware, that only needs water to make it the most fruitful region of the earth; but it will have cost $150 or $200 or $250 an acre when it shall have reached that stage of development which will afford any return whatever. That, to me, is not quite in harmony with the general idea of furnishing to the soldiers of our returning Army money with which to buy property that can within a reasonable time become productive. I want to speed the reclamation of these lands in every way that I can, but if we are doing it for the benefit of the soldier and not for the benefit of the country as a whole, I had much rather furnish him a loan of money which he could immediately utilize for the purpose of entering some business or enterprise that was not so far in the future in its promise of returns.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Committee on the Public Lands of the other House had that very suggestion brought before them, though, of course, not so well put as the Senator puts it; in fact, they had six or seven different propositions before them. One was to grant to each soldier a bounty of six months' pay; another to grant him a bounty of three months' pay; but after many weeks of investigation, it was ascertained that the sentiment of the soldier was that the soldier did not want any gift, did not want any bounty, but was a man ready to earn his own living if only given a fair chance.

Mr. CUMMINS. I glory in that.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; the soldier wants to become a part of the substantial realty-holding community, to own a farm. If he does not wish the farm, he need not take it; of course, he would not be compelled to go there. I shall be glad to vote for any other legislation which will lend money to the soldier upon security.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then why not pass a bill which will loan to each soldier a sum of money proportionate to the entire appropriation, which he may use for any purpose for which he desires to employ it, if he shall give to the Government fair and reasonable security for its repayment?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the slightest objection to such legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why limit it merely to those who want to become farmers? Second, why limit it to those who want to enter upon the arid lands of the country or upon the swamp lands of the country or upon the cut-over lands of the country? It seems to me that if you put such reservations upon it, you have done very little for the soldier.

Mr. ASHURST. The limitation is made because when you give a man an opportunity to enter upon the arid lands or the swamp lands after they have been reclaimed, you have given him an opportunity to become independent if not opulent for his lifetime. Lend him $1,500, $2,000, $5,000; I have no objection to that; but he would prefer to have a loan where he could have 40 years in which to repay. He will repay it easily in 10 years, if he so desires, after the land has been reclaimed.

When the vast irrigation systems of the West were initiated some of us feared that the settlers could not repay the advances within the 10 years, and my distinguished colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] secured the passage of a bill extending the time of payment from 10 to 20 years. We now find, however, that it is not a hardship for them to repay the money, so rich are the lands that have been reclaimed and to such high prices have food products and other products of the farm mounted.

I thank the Senator from Iowa for his statesmanlike suggestion as to the bill before us, but the particular subject the committee has reported is a bill establishing community life for the farmer. I am sure that the Senate will in due time take up the other questions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the report of the House Committee on Public Lands and also a letter signed by Col. Henry D. Lindsley, chairman of the national executive committee of the American Legion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. I will tender the amendment and shall ask a vote upon it at the appropriate time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to a condition that has arisen in reference to the House bill as reported?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; that is the bill I have offered as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senator had offered that bill as an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Arizona that I have received a letter from the Interior Department, and I have also had Mr. Cory, who has this particular matter in hand for the Secretary of the Interior, call upon me to point out a number of provisions of the House bill that should not be agreed to. He has given his reasons why they should not. On that account I will say to the Senator from Arizona that I should not like to vote for the amendment as now framed as an amendment to the pending bill.

However, I will say further to the Senator that as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands I expect before many days to call the committee together to begin the consideration of the soldiers' settlement bill. I have applications from, I suppose, 50 people from different parts of the United States asking that they be allowed to be heard upon the bill. I recognize the fact that there is great opposition to the bill, coming from a great many sources. I do not feel justified in saying that those people should not be heard. Therefore, I am going to ask the Public Lands Committee to set a day for hearings and to continue such hearings until we get through with those asking to be heard. After the hearings I shall ask the committee to consider the bill; and if we can agree upon the bill and amendments to it, which will justify reporting the bill to the Senate, I expect to do that. Then we can discuss it pro and con until the Senate itself decides as to whether or not it wishes to enact the proposed legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, with the assurances that have been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, that he will convene his committee very soon and give this question a complete and independent examination, without relating it to other subjects, I shall withdraw the amendment which I have proposed.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 216, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 487) providing employment and rural homes for those who have served with the military and naval forces through the reclamation of lands to be known as the national soldier settlement act, having considered the same, report it to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, with sundry amendments which appear at the end of this report.

The committee has given the most patient and thorough consideration to the matter of framing a comprehensive constructive program in the interest of our returning soldiers.

Broadly, the problem is how to absorb them into our national life on terms that shall be satisfactory to them and profitable to the Nation. Specifically, the problem as presented in all of the bills referred to the committee is how to furnish them with immediate employment and to open the way to self-sustaining homes on the land, and how to furnish them with the necessary capital.

The basis of the discussion has been H. R. 487, introduced by Representative MONDELL, of Wyoming, but the committee has encouraged the freest expression of opinion on every aspect of the subject. As a consequence, the testimony has covered a wide range, and developed a variety of opinion. But there is one thing on which all agreed: Something should be done for the soldier. As a means of showing how the committee has reached its own conclusions, it will be helpful briefly to review various propositions which have been advanced as substitutes for the legislation proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, indorsed by the President and embodied in several bills that have come to the committee.

VARIOUS SUBSTITUTES PROPOSED.

1. A bonus for all soldiers: This has been proposed in three different forms: (a) Three hundred dollars for each enlisted man, which would require a total appropriation of $1,200,000,000; (b) a bonus of $25 per month for each month in service, which would amount to about the same total if the average length of service was one year; (c) a bonus of $5,000 for each soldier, which will call for $20,000,000,000.

2. Individual farm loans: These have been proposed for various amounts and purposes, but all on the basis of the "infiltration plan," a term now commonly used to describe the method of individual settlement on scattered farms, as distinguished from the plan of community settlement. It has been proposed: (a) That a flat sum of $4,000 be offered to each soldier for the purchase of an approved farm wherever he may select it, such advance to be made upon the basis of 100 per cent of the value, at 4 per cent interest, payable in 40 years. If all soldiers accepted the offer it would call for an appropriation of $16,000,000,000; (b) the same proposition with a maximum loan of $10,000, which would call for $40,000,000,000 if accepted by all; (c) the same proposition extended to cover advances for necessary improvements, live stock, and equipment; (d) the same proposition, except that the loan shall be elastic in amount, ranging down to 50 per cent of value.

3. Loans for city or country homes: That every man returned from the colors be offered a loan of $2,500 at a low rate of interest (4 per cent suggested), payable over 40 years' time, provided he invest the money either in a farm or in acquiring a home in city or town. Assuming the unanimous acceptance of this proposition, it would call for $10,000,000,000.

4. Loans for all lines of business: That soldiers desiring to engage in any line of business be provided with loans of various amounts, ranging up to 100 per cent of the necessary capital. It is impossible to estimate the appropriation that would be required, but the idea is for the Nation to supply the financial backing for every soldier who desires to engage in trade, industry, or profession of whatever nature.

5. Advancing money to the States: That $500,000,000 be apportioned among the several States on the basis of the number of men supplied to the colors, and that the States be permitted to use the money in any way they consider best for the soldier's welfare. The same suggestion was made on the basis of a larger but indefinite appropriation.

6. Leave it to private capital: That the matter be left entirely to private capital to finance, with helpful cooperation on the part of the Government in safeguarding any proposition for investors and settlers.

The problem of dealing with disbanded armies: The problem we are facing is not new in human history. It has been the problem of all countries after all great wars, and it is preeminently the problem of all countries to-day. "From Rome under Cæsar, to France under Napoleon, down even to our own Civil War," said Secretary Lane in his letter of May 31, 1918, to the President and Members of Congress, "the problem arose as to what could be done with the soldiers to be mustered out of the military service."

There are two considerations to be borne in mind in dealing with the question: The first is the welfare of the soldier himself. It is incumbent upon Congress to see that no man who offered his life to protect the Nation in time of war shall come to want in time of peace. Every soldier who needs employment upon being discharged from the Army should have employment; and, so far as possible, employment at some congenial task. Moreover, it will be desirable in many instances to provide the soldier with a permanent occupation, and this should be of such a nature as to lead in the direction of genuine economic independence. The second consideration to be observed is, of course, the welfare of the Nation.

The American stock is of the colonizing breed. Not only the descendants of our earliest settlers but even our latest immigrants belong to the element which does not rest content with existing conditions, but constantly seeks to better them by reaching out to new opportunities in new lands. Our great patrimony of free public lands has been the safety valve of the Republic in the past. Lord Macaulay predicted that when this was gone—"then will come the real test of your institutions." If there was any measure of truth in the prediction, the present moment carries a challenge to the genius of American statesmanship, for the free public lands suitable for agriculture without irrigation are practically gone. Nevertheless, if the past is any guide for the present and the future, this is a challenge which must be accepted in order that the Nation shall remain sound and wholesome, and that man's conquest over the resources of nature shall go on in this and in coming generations.

In this connection it is worth while to recall how the veterans of the Revolution made their way through the almost trackless forests of the Alleghenies and planted the seeds of the great civilization we now behold both north and south of the Ohio River. It is well to recall how the veterans of the Civil War completed the occupation and development of the great region watered by the Mississippi and its tributaries, carrying their homes and farms to the extreme limit of the district where crops are assured by natural rainfall, and to the very threshold of the arid region.

There is another lesson which it is very important for us to learn from the past. The number of veterans who actually availed themselves of land opportunities at the close of former wars was small as compared with the total number engaged. Even so, the invitation to go on with the development of natural resources was effective not only in meeting the needs of the discharged soldier, but in steadying the whole fabric of industry and society at the most critical periods in our history.

As has already been said, the problem of how best to provide for the welfare of the returning soldier is not our problem alone, but equally that of all other countries. It is interesting to observe that the other great English-speaking countries—England, Canada, and Australia—are turning to the land as a means of meeting the need of the hour. England has a density of population equal to that of any American State. Its last acre of free public land disappeared centuries ago. And yet England is finding room upon her crowded soil to make more homes and farms for her soldier boys, and she is backing them in the new adventure with her money and credit. Canada and Australia have adopted most generous policies in this regard, as fully set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior on H. R. 487.

LEADING PRINCIPLES OF A SOUND POLICY.

In view of the foregoing considerations, the committee has decided that it is unquestionably the duty of Congress to enact legislation with the least possible delay which shall make provision for the welfare of returning soldiers, sailors, and marines; and that such legislation should be based on these principles:

First. The continuation of our historic policy of opening the way to work and homes on the land for the veterans of our wars.

Second. In the absence of any considerable area of public land suitable to the purpose, the acquisition of lands now in private ownership followed by such improvement as may be necessary, either by clearing, fertilizing, draining, or irrigating, in order to render them fit for the best forms of agriculture.

Third. The employment of soldiers wherever practicable in all departments of the work to be done on the basis of current wages to the end (a) that opportunities for remunerative work may be supplied to those who need or desire it, and (b) that the soldiers may have opportunity to accumulate the amount of money that will be required as first payment upon property subsequently allotted to them.

Fourth. The advance of limited sums of money to be used by the settlers in the construction of permanent improvements, such as houses, barns, and fences, and of other limited sums for the purchase of necessary live stock and equipment, always with a reasonable margin of security for the Government.

Fifth. The subdivision of lands into lots, farm-workers' tracts and farms and the disposal of such property upon such terms as shall, in a period of not more than 40 years, reimburse the Government for its entire outlay, with interest at 4 per cent per annum.

Sixth. The provision of reasonable safeguards against speculation in farm allotments, to the end that permanent homes shall be made in good faith.

Seventh. The colonization of soldier settlers in groups of sufficient size to enable them to take advantage of every opportunity for economy and efficiency in the purchase of supplies and sale of products and for organized social life; also to permit them to receive the full benefit of community-created values.

Eighth. The absolute solvency of the entire enterprise, alike from the standpoint of the Government and the soldier settler, and the authorization of a total expenditure of not more than $500,000,000, but with actual appropriations made from time to time as particular projects shall be submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior.

SUBSTITUTE PROPOSALS CONSIDERED.

The adoption of these fundamental principles necessarily eliminates from consideration some of the ideas which have been suggested as substitutes for H. R. 487.

The proposition for a bonus to be given to all enlisted men, involving a total immediate outlay ranging from one billion to twenty billion dollars, is not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

Practically the same observations apply to the proposal to advance capital for the purpose of setting soldiers up in any and every line of business. Except as it deals with lands now owned or hereafter to be owned by the Government, it is not within the jurisdiction of this committee.

The proposal to leave the entire question of providing for the soldiers' welfare to private enterprise and capital is, of course, in conflict with what the committee regards as the plain duty of Congress at this time, while the proposition to advance money to build or purchase homes in cities and towns is a matter which should be embodied in separate legislation, if at all. In that case, it would be the business of some other committee.

DANGERS OF INFILTRATION.

The infiltration plan is different, and, upon superficial consideration, may be regarded as a somewhat satisfactory substitute for H. R. 487. On careful analysis, however, the committee has been unable to adopt it, notwithstanding the fact that it undoubtedly commands the earnest support of some of the sincerest friends of the movement to establish the soldiers upon the land.

In the first place, it would call for the expenditure of a vast sum of money and could not be made a sound, solvent proposition for the Government, at least if it authorized a loan for 100 per cent of the value of the property purchased, while if it did not authorize a 100 per cent loan it could be availed of only by soldiers possessing a considerable amount of money. This is true because it does not offer one hour's employment; hence, no opportunity whatever for the soldier to earn and accumulate money against the time when he will enter into the possession of his farm. For the same reason it provides no means for getting the necessary live stock, implements, and other equipment, or the necessary working capital.

The soldier settler, possibly devoid entirely of agricultural knowledge, experience, or training, would be suddenly thrown upon a farm subject to a mortgage of 100 per cent, without a horse, a cow, or a chicken; without plow, harrow, or any other agricultural tools, and without a dollar in the bank to enable him to live and make his crop. At least that would be the precise situation in very many instances; or, if not, then we would have simply shut the door in the face of the soldier whose sole assets are strong arms, and a sturdy heart—the very man who merits first consideration.

In other words, the infiltration plan fails utterly to meet the situation in which a very large proportion of our soldiers find themselves at the time of demobilization.

It is argued that many more soldiers would purchase farms if they could borrow 100 per cent and locate wherever they chose, than would do so under the plan of community settlement. Undoubtedly this is true, especially if they are permitted to sell the farm at any time, as is proposed by most of the advocates of infiltration.

Analyze this argument and what do you find? First, a demand for an immediate appropriation of, say, $10,000,000,000. This figure is named by the advocates of the plan on the basis of an average loan of $5,000 and the expectation that at least 2,000,000 men would borrow the money, buy a farm, and take their chances in working it or trying to sell at a quick profit. But in considering the effects of the policy we must assume that the entire 4,000,000 soldiers would have the right to borrow $5,000 each, on condition that they immediately bought farms.

Now, suppose it were announced to-morrow that the credit of the United States, to the extent of $20,000,000,000, the aggregate amount of all four Liberty loans, has been made available for this purpose, what would be the effect on the market for country lands? Nothing less than the imagination of Jules Verne could picture the result. We should witness the greatest orgy of speculation in the history of the world. No scheme of official appraisement that could be devised could possibly protect the soldier and the country from imposition in the sale of unfit properties at exorbitant prices. The law of supply and demand would itself go very far to boost land prices out of sight, and that at a time when existing land values are at the highest level in the history of the United States—three times as great as in 1900, 19 years ago. Four million buyers standing in line scattered over every State and every county; over every city, town, and hamlet from Maine to California, from the Lakes to the Gulf, each with $5,000 spot cash to pay for a farm. It staggers the imagination. We reel under the thought of the consequences, even the first consequences, not to think of the ultimate outcome, the final aftermath—the "morning after."

Even under normal conditions, without artificial inflation of prices already extremely high, the soldier settler purchasing a going and paying farm in an established community would be at a disadvantage as compared with a soldier who takes advantage of "the ground floor" proposition proposed by community settlement. Nothing works more inexorably than the law of unearned increment, and in every well-established community this law has already ground its grist. On the other hand, where large tracts of unimproved land are acquired and put in condition for cultivation by wholesale operations, and where there is a simultaneous movement of hundreds of families practically at one time, followed by the creation of many public and private improvements, the law of unearned increment works to the advantage of the settler.

In the one case he is the victim of the law; in the other, the beneficiary. In the one case he pays the increment; in the other, he gets it. The history of a thousand communities throughout the United States might be cited in confirmation of this proposition, but a single instance will suffice. Let anyone consider the history of Salt Lake Valley in Utah, the earliest community settlement undertaken in the western half of the continent, and observe how the pioneer settlers were enriched to the extent of tens of millions by this principle, and he will certainly be convinced of the soundness of this view.

The conclusive argument against the infiltration plan rests, however, not upon what might happen in the future, but upon what actually has happened in the past.

Australia has led the way in formulating policies to establish homes on the land. And Australia was beguiled by the plausible argument put forth in favor of infiltration. Australia tried it, found it an absolute failure, abandoned it, adopted community settlement in its place, found it gloriously successful, and is now extending it beyond anything dreamed of at this time in the United States. Why should we adopt the model that failed in preference to the model that succeeded?

According to Dr. Elwood Mead, for nine years in charge of land settlement in Australia, as he now is in California, Australia found that it was practically impossible for the Government to exercise any effective supervision over settlers located on scattered farms. Official supervision of settlers looking to the Government for their entire capital is, of course, not only prudent but essential; first, at the time when farms are purchased, and then over the long period required for the settler to get firmly established on a solvent basis. But the mere overhead cost of travel and salaries for Government agents proved prohibitive. There was constant danger that settlers would be imposed upon in the sale of farms. Every man who had a farm for sale pursued the man eligible to borrow Government money for the purpose of buying his farm. There were many opportunities for collusion between sellers, buyers, and intermediary agents. The net result was that buyers did not get the worth of their money, while the Government was unable to devise any system of effective protection for the settler or itself.

Precisely the same difficulties hampered the Government in its effort to look after the settler and to assist him to succeed. The system was inherently unworkable. Practically the same experience was had in England, and in consequence of the lesson learned at the cost of disappointment, hardship, and pecuniary loss, England has now adopted the plan of community settlement for the benefit of her returning soldiers, fixing the minimum unit at 100 families.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

The present bill has been perfected after consultation with many elements of citizenship representing many different parts of the United States. Soldiers, statesmen, sociologists, men of large affairs, practical farmers, gardeners, live-stock men, experienced administrators of the immensely successful Mormon colonization work in Utah—all have been consulted, in the hope of evolving a measure that should be founded on sound economic principles, yet made sufficiently elastic to fit the widely varying conditions which must be dealt with in different parts of the country.

The original idea was to develop projects in every State where feasible opportunities were found, and the latest reports are to the effect that such projects will be found in every State. The ideal project would be one which should offer a sufficient area to make possible complete community development and thus to afford the cooperation, assistance, encouragement, and stimulus to be found in a well-organized community. The bill, however, fixes no minimum unit either for the farm or the project. It will be entirely feasible, under the wide discretion granted to the Secretary of the Interior, acting in cooperation with State authorities, to develop a small number of contiguous farms. In this connection it is well worth while to quote the testimony of Arthur P. Davis, the Director of the United States Reclamation Service:

"We know of an attractive tract in Pennsylvania and quite a number in the State of New York. In Greene County, N. Y., there is a tract that I had better describe as being typical of others that can probably be found in other parts of the Northeast, where the settlement is supposed to be rather dense.

"Not far from Albany, in the Hudson Valley, is an area of eighteen or twenty thousand acres already in farms, and with farm buildings. The farms are usually from 154 to 400 acres, and most of them are under cultivation, but the majority are farmed by tenants. The great majority of the farms in the group I speak of are listed for sale, and I should say that the majority of the farms that are offered for sale could, at the time I looked, last December, be purchased at less than the present value of the improvements."

Secretary Lane has also directed attention to opportunities in the Northeastern States, as follows:

"We have the land; we have it in every part of this country, in the North as well as in the South. One of the richest parts of the United States is Aroostook County, Me. Maine has been deserted in part in her farming regions because the boys have had a lust for the western country that I love, and I can not blame them for that; but they have left good farms there. In Massachusetts it may surprise you to know, perhaps, that we have one little section of country around Cape Cod where there is some of the richest land in the United States, and it has been proved so in the last two or three years; and in the body of the State they have very considerable quantities of land that needs to be cared for a little bit—cut-over land that has been deserted, that needs to be brought into shape—that will make good farm land. The same thing is true in New York."

It should be said that it is not proposed, as some critics have averred, to divert men from their own States and ask them to settle in "district swamps and deserts." The idea is to find opportunities of employment and homemaking in their own State and, so far as practicable, in their own districts, unless they prefer to go elsewhere. Since there will be an average fund of something more than $10,000,000 available for each State, it will be entirely possible to have many small projects in a given State, provided favorable opportunities are found. It will be possible also to create industrial settlements near centers of population where groups of soldiers engaged as wage earners may desire to make homes on very small farms and perpetuate the beneficent scheme of war gardens. In a word, the soldier-settlement fund is designed to assist soldiers in getting homes under the best conditions as these shall develop in practical administration.

Attention should be called to the safeguards which will surround the expenditure of the large appropriation authorized in this bill. The first actual appropriation asked for will be very small, only sufficient to enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with various State commissions and enter into preliminary contracts for the acquisition of the needed lands. Each particular project and contract will then be submitted to the Committee on Appropriations and, if approved, presented for the action of Congress. Under this system the danger of serious blunders in the selection of projects would be very small indeed. Four different agencies will be brought into action before a dollar is expended in actual development, viz: First, the Secretary of the Interior, with his well-equipped organization for investigation, acting in cooperation with the farm-loan board of the district; second, the governors and their State commissions, who will doubtless cooperate with important civic bodies in their various States; third, the Committee on Appropriations, which must consider and pass upon each contract and project; fourth, both Houses of Congress, who must actually vote the appropriation before the money can be expended.

The project having been developed to a point where the lands, by restoration, clearing, drainage, or irrigation, or a combination of these, were in fit condition for utilization for farming, the area would be divided into farms of suitable size to support a family, and the price fixed on the farms, which in the aggregate will pay the cost of the project, the price of each farm to represent, as near as it is possible, its value compared with the total cost and the value of the other farms.

The soldier who has worked upon the project will be given the preference in the selection of the farms, and a payment of 5 per cent of the value fixed is to be paid at the time the farm is allotted. Assuming the average value of $5,000 or $6,000 per farm, this would require an initial payment of $250 to $300, a sum which the soldier could save in anticipation of the projects during the period of the development of the project, which would be from one to three years.

After the farms have been allotted assistance is to be given the soldier in the making of his improvements, the maximum loan provided for this purpose being $1,500 and not in excess of three-fourths of the cost or value of improvements. The soldier's contribution to improvements could, and undoubtedly in the majority of cases would, be in the form of labor. During or in connection with the making of his improvements the soldier could by his personal efforts and work easily contribute his 25 per cent of the total cost.

Provision is also made for loans to the soldier settler for the purchase of necessary live stock and equipment, the maximum of such loans being $1,200, or 75 per cent of the total cost of necessary live stock and 60 per cent of the cost of equipment. Here again the soldier's obligations under this class of loan could, if necessary, be met by his individual efforts. In fact, while it is assumed that in many cases the soldier would have some savings which he could utilize in getting a start, it is believed that a man starting at the beginning of one of these projects without any capital could through industry and frugality earn and save enough to meet his initial and other payments as they become due.

APPROVED BY PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

The late President Theodore Roosevelt advocated the soldier settlement policy as proposed by Secretary Lane in the last article which he wrote for the press. President Wilson has urged it upon Congress in two messages. The governors of 27 States have appointed commissions to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior, and all of these commissions have expressed their earnest interest in legislation of this character.

One of the strongest indorsements of the bill in its present shape has come from the officers of the Eastern States Agricultural Industrial Exposition, which has its headquarters at Springfield, Mass., but represents 10 Northeastern States—the six States of New England and New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware. This organization represents some of the strongest business interests in the country, who have inaugurated great plans looking to the systematic renewal and restoration of a prosperous agriculture throughout the northeastern part of the United States. They have discovered the very intimate relationship between industrial and agricultural prosperity and find that the existing condition under which, in the State of Massachusetts, for example, 92.8 of their entire population lives in cities, a very serious menace to their welfare. They are seeking, through the instrumentality of a permanent exposition at Springfield, to demonstrate that farming can be made a paying business and that it is possible to create more attractive conditions of rural life. These gentlemen have discovered that their work exactly parallels the policy embodied in the soldier settlement plan and have come to believe that the soldier will do as great a work for his country at home as he did abroad, while at the same time achieving an independence for himself. Hence they are urging the support of the measure by all the Members from their 10 States.

DOES THE SOLDIER WANT IT?

The most vital question that can be asked in regard to this policy is this: Does the soldier want it? The answer is: He does. The American Legion has officially indorsed the bill after a careful consideration of its provisions. Up to the present writing 112,088 soldiers have made formal application for opportunities of employment and home getting under the terms of this bill. The number, which is increasing every day, ranges all the way from 6,752 in Illinois to 80 in Delaware.

The most impressive evidence in respect to the soldiers is contained in letters from commanding officers with the American Expeditionary Forces in Germany. Maj. Gen. Mark L. Hersey, for example, in command of the Fourth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, was requested, among others, by Secretary Lane, to ascertain the feeling of his men. He states that he went into the matter "with a view to determining in actual figures the number of men in this division that would not only be interested in farming, but interested with sufficient definiteness to take up the work should the plan be put into effect." He reports in detail upon each regiment, the net result being as follows:

"Present strength, officers and enlisted men, 23,363.

"Number interested in soldier settlement plan, 4,595."

Gen. Hersey expresses his own opinion as follows:

"The men who are returning to America from the European battle fields have given to their country the best they have. They have paid their debt to America; not in full perhaps, but in full up to the present time. It is up to the United States to take care of them; to exercise over them a proper degree of paternalism; to make them feel that what they have given up in order to come to the war will be made good by the Government. These men are coming with a higher respect for American institutions and for constituted authority than they ever had before. They are thoroughly good citizens who need only the ties that bind them to the land, that give them a sense of proprietorship in the soil, that impel each man to establish his own home and to rear his own family. All these your proposed plan should furnish. I am heartily in favor of it. I hope you may push it to a successful conclusion. Several of the division staff officers have received letters similar to the one that was sent to me. I might say that this letter voices their sentiments as well as my own."

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
New York City, September 5, 1919.

The honorable Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: The attention of the joint national executive committee of the American Legion has been called to misrepresentations made to Congress with respect to the legion's attitude toward the soldier settlement bill (H. R. 487). The committee particularly refers to a letter inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 2, 1919, appearing on page 4624 thereof. In order that Members of Congress may be correctly advised as to the attitude of the American Legion toward H. R. 487, the soldier settlement bill, the following is respectfully submitted by the national executive committee of the American Legion:

The American Legion has never gone on record in favor of H. R. 487 or any other specific land legislation now before Congress. The following resolution was adopted at the St. Louis caucus of the American Legion, held May 8, 1919, on this particular subject:

"Whereas the reclamation of arid, swamp, or cut-over timber lands is one of the great constructive problems of immediate interest to the Nation; and,

"Whereas one of the questions for immediate consideration is that of presenting to discharged soldiers and sailors an opportunity to establish homes and create for themselves a place in the field of constructive effort; and

"Whereas one of the purposes for which the formation of the American Legion is contemplated is to take an energetic interest in all constructive measures designed to promote the happiness and contentment of the people, and to actively encourage all proper movements of a general nature to assist the men of the Army and Navy in solving the problems of wholesome existence; and

"Whereas the Department of the Interior and the Reclamation Service have been engaged in formulating and presenting to the country broad, constructive plans for the reclamation of arid, swamp, or cut-over timber lands: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the caucus of delegates to the American Legion in convention assembled in the city of St. Louis, Mo., That we indorse the efforts heretofore made for the reclamation of lands, and respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States the adoption at an early date of broad and comprehensive legislation for economic reclamation of all lands susceptible of reclamation and production."

Preliminary to carrying out this resolution, the joint national executive committee of the American Legion at its headquarters, No. 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City, on July 8, 1919, adopted a resolution authorizing the chairman to immediately appoint three members of the legion to devote the necessary time to a thorough study of the subject and to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in effectuating the resolution of the St. Louis caucus indorsing the principle of land development.

The above action was taken after a representative of the Secretary of the Interior had appeared before the national executive committee of the American Legion in order to explain the provisions of the soldiers' settlement bill. The Secretary of the Interior had requested this privilege and the courtesy was, therefore, extended to his representative. It was definitely decided, however, that pending the results of the study to be made of the committee of three, appointed to consider the subject of land legislation, the American Legion would take no action on the Mondell bill, or any other specific legislation of this kind. It is the intention now, however, to take no action on this subject until the first annual convention of the American Legion, which is to be held in Minneapolis on November 11, 1919.

It is not the policy of the American Legion to attack or oppose other veteran societies; therefore, the insinuations cast against the American Legion in the letter which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are not discussed as they have no bearing on the subject matter of this letter.

Very respectfully,

HENRY D. LINDSLEY,
Chairman National Executive Committee.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have been very much impressed with the illuminating contributions which have been made for the last three hours to Senate bill 2472, but at this time I should like to offer three amendments which I consider more germane to the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, in order to carry out the ordinary procedure of the Senate, at this particular time I should like to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] how long he thinks the hearing to which he has referred will probably last and from what sources have come the requests for such hearings?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from New Jersey will not object, I can state in a very few minutes from just what sources the objections come.

Mr. EDGE. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The objections to what is known as the soldiers' settlement bill come from the following sources—I will not mention them all: First, there is an organization in the United States, with headquarters in New York, which has started a propaganda for the purpose of securing a direct appropriation from the Congress of the United States of $500 for every soldier who served in the war with the Central Powers.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator wish to hear them?

Mr. SMOOT. They have asked to be heard, and I think it would be better to give them a hearing. There is another class which wants a direct appropriation or else a direct loan of $2,000 to each soldier and officer who participated in the war. There is another propaganda, headed by some very eminent men and women in New York, having headquarters also at Chicago, Ill., who are opposed to the passage of the bill in its present form and desire to present a plan which they have laid before the Public Lands Committee in the past and which they claim can be worked out by individuals in the United States who are at present prepared to advance the money to reclaim the lands.

Then there is another class of western soldiers who object to the passage of this bill on the ground that they entered lands before they joined the Army. They went to France and fought alongside of the other soldiers, and now when they come back and go upon their lands, under the bill they can get no assistance whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That could be easily cured by an amendment, I take it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am merely rehearsing some of the objections to the bill. A great many of the western people feel that if we pass this bill it will interfere greatly with the completion of the reclamation projects now under way, claiming that with a fifty million dollar direct appropriation they could complete all the reclamation projects now under way and give more land and earlier relief to the soldiers than can be afforded under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I assume the Senator does not think that is practicable.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only reciting the objections of some of those who have appealed to me and the reasons why they want to be heard.

Mr. President, there are about a half dozen other organizations that are directing opposition to the bill, but their objections seem so trivial to me that I do not wish to put them in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the point I was trying to make was that it would save the record and save the time of the committee—although personally time is not so valuable a consideration to me just now, perhaps, for I find I shall probably have to leave the city for a week or two—if all the theories and opinions as to what ought to be done from every source on earth were not exploited before the committee. The Senator from Utah, the Senator from Iowa, and other Senators who have been considering this question for 25 years are already thoroughly familiar with the subject; and to have developed the theories of some gentlemen in New York, Chicago, and other places as to the disposition of the public lands and the proper way to reclaim them would probably impose a tax upon the patience of the Senator from Utah and the other members of the Committee on Public Lands. I hope he will not exercise too much of that peculiar characteristic in dealing with those who are apparently interesting themselves in matters in which they have very little concern.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 19, before the word "citizens" it is proposed to strike out the word "the," and in line 20, after the word "States" to strike out the words "or of a State thereof," so that it will read:

chartered under the laws of the United States or of a State of the United States, or by firms or companies, the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, after the very delightful discussion of a very good bill between the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I wish to revert just for a moment to the speech of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

I desire to say——

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Do I understand that I have lost the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not know that the Senator from New Jersey had the floor.

Mr. EDGE. I was recognized, and introduced some amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator introduced them.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator from Mississippi is recognized to speak on the amendments, I presume I will lose the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator that I thought he had yielded the floor when he offered his amendments. I shall only take up two or three minutes of time. It is to discuss a matter that I am sure will convince even the Senator from New Jersey.

If the treaty of peace, with the league of nations covenant included, shall be adopted, the merciless murder of men will be minimized, the wanton destruction of property stopped, the heavy burdens of enormous taxation lightened, and the stability, peace, and happiness of the world made secure.

I am strengthened in that conviction when I recall that the total battle deaths of all nations in this war were greater than all deaths in all the wars in the previous 100 years.

The total battle deaths amounted to 7,450,000.

From 1793 to 1914 the battle deaths amounted to 6,000,000.

The American battle losses in this war were 50,000 killed and 236,000 wounded.

The Russian battle losses were 34 times greater, the German losses 32 times greater, the French 28 times greater, and the British losses 18 times greater than those of the United States.

The direct cost of the war to the United States up to the end of April, 1919, amounted to $21,500,000,000.

The figure is twenty times the prewar national debt. It would have paid the entire cost of our Government from 1791 up to the outbreak of the war.

Our expenditure in this war was sufficient to have carried on the Revolutionary War continuously for more than 1,000 years at the rate of expenditure which that war actually involved.

From April, 1917, to April, 1919, the war cost the United States more than $1,000,000 an hour.

Treasury disbursements during that period reached a total of $23,500,000,000.

The pay of the Army during the war cost more than the combined salaries of all the public-school principals and teachers for a five-year period immediately preceding the war.

The total direct war cost amounted to around $186,000,000,000.

It is to prevent the recurrence of these incidents and these conditions that a league of nations is desired.

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey offers a further amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 13, in the proposed amendment of the committee, where the committee proposes to insert certain words after striking out, beginning with the word "notwithstanding," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "section," at the end of line 23.

Mr. GRONNA. On line 13?

The SECRETARY. On line 13, beginning with the word "notwithstanding," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "section," at the end of line 23.

Mr. EDGE. I will say, Mr. President, that that is half of the amendment of which the Senator from North Dakota was going to introduce the other half.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that the amendment which I propose to offer strikes out all of that page.

Mr. EDGE. Yes; but, if I may explain, there are two objects in that amendment. One, as I understand the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, to provide for a double liability and the other to strike out this section which the amendment I have just offered strikes out. I am not prepared to accept the first part, on the question of double liability; but I am entirely prepared to accept the elimination of lines 13 to 23, which was discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] in the debate on Saturday, so I have offered the amendment to eliminate that, leaving the single question in which the Senator from North Dakota is also interested to be determined by the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well; I have no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I had understood from the Senator that he was willing to eliminate, also, all of the section after the word "subscriptions," in line 13.

Mr. EDGE. That is already eliminated.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right, then.

Mr. EDGE. I think that is eliminated by the adoption of this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This must be the situation of affairs: As the bill comes from the committee there is a motion to strike out, and a motion to insert in lieu of the matter stricken out. Now, as the Chair understands, in the part to be inserted the Senator from New Jersey wants to strike out, beginning with the word "notwithstanding." Is that right?

Mr. EDGE. That is correct; and, if I may be permitted to draw the attention of the Chair, the part stricken out by the committee was already acquiesced in by the Senate when we passed the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it was passed over. The question will be on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to amend the part to be inserted.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, the question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, beginning with line 2——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That does not touch this amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. It has the same effect as this amendment. It affects a portion of this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask whether the committee amendment has been agreed to yet?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it has not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to yet.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he allow the committee amendment to be agreed to, and then offer his amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. That can not be done, because it will foreclose my right to offer this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not want to touch that.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I do. I want to strike out all of page 8 after the word "shareholders," in line 2, down to line 24, and insert the matter which I send to the desk.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Senator from North Dakota, we are entirely in agreement excepting that I am endeavoring to have something stricken out to which there is no objection, and the Senator wants to put in an amendment to a part of it. If the Senator's amendment should be defeated, then the entire matter would be back again. Now I am taking out this part of the section, with the exception of the first four lines, which the Senator wants to change.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This must be the parliamentary situation, as the Senator understands it:

The committee made a report to strike out, beginning at line 5 with the word "extent."

Mr. SMOOT. Line 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Line 5.

Mr. SMOOT. It is line 4 on my copy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is line 5 in the bill that the Chair has; beginning on line 5 with the word "extent," and going down to the word "such," in line 12; and the committee offered to insert in place of it "extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions. Notwithstanding," and so on. That is a proposition to strike out and insert. Now the Senator from New Jersey moves to amend the portion to be inserted by striking out all after the word "Notwithstanding." That leaves the pending question, then, to strike out all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and to insert "extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions." Now the Senator from North Dakota wants to strike out everything from line 2, the entire page, and insert "shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section." The Chair thinks that is an entirely different motion to strike out and insert from the one that is now pending before the Senate, and this must be the parliamentary situation:

Senators have in their possession the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. If they are in favor of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, they should vote "no" on the committee amendment to strike out and insert, which will then leave the House text, and thereupon the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will be in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well, that is satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask a question, in order to understand clearly how I should vote? Are we voting now on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; you are not voting on that at all. The Chair tried to explain that there is a motion now to strike out all from lines 4 to 12, inclusive, and insert a few words. If that motion is carried, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will not be in order.

Mr. EDGE. If that prevails——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that prevails, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will not be in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think it is the intention of the Senator from New Jersey to have that happen, because he has agreed to have at least a portion of my amendment adopted.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. GRONNA. It was for that reason that I intended to ask the parliamentary question if my amendment would still be in order if the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey were adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can not be in order if the committee amendment is adopted.

Mr. EDGE. That is the reason, Mr. President, why I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he withhold the introduction of his further amendment until we strike out the balance of the section to which there is no objection, and then that he offer to amend the one portion of the section which refers to the double liability, on which I desire to say a word.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Chair says it will not be in order.

Mr. GRONNA. The Chair holds that it will not be in order.

Mr. EDGE. As I understand the Chair, then, we must discuss both amendments in one.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he move to strike out all of the section after the word "subscriptions" in line 4, and that will leave the original text open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. In line 5. There are two prints of the bill.

Mr. EDGE. I think that would meet the situation, because it would leave the wording referring to the unpaid stock subscriptions open to further amendment. If I may withdraw the amendment offered, I will move an amendment that we strike out from page 8 of my bill, starting with line 5, down to line 23, inclusive; that that be stricken from the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. If that motion prevails——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair seems to be unable to be understood about the parliamentary situation, and he will repeat it.

The committee reported an amendment striking out lines 5 to 12, inclusive, and offering to insert certain matter running down to the end of line 23. That presented to the Senate the question of a motion to strike out and a motion to insert, each of which, under the rules of the Senate, is amendable before the final vote is taken, and not divisible. Now, the Senator from New Jersey has moved to strike out all after the word "subscriptions" in line 13. That leaves the committee amendment to strike out lines 5 to 12, inclusive, and insert the words on line 13, to wit, "extent of their unpaid stock subscriptions."

The Senator from North Dakota is not proposing to amend the text of the part to be stricken out. He has an entirely different motion. He is moving to strike out all after line 2 and to insert entirely different matter.

There are two ways to reach it. One would be for the Senator from New Jersey, if he has authority to do so, to withdraw the entire committee amendment, and then the text would be open to amendment by the Senate. The other would be to defeat this amendment, in which event the House text would stand, and the Senator from North Dakota could move to amend it.

Mr. GRONNA. This is a very important amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

RECESS.

Mr. EDGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 8, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Every day is a fresh beginning, every morn is the world made new. Be with us, O God, as we enter upon another week of work. Help us in our efforts to serve our dear country and all humanity. Lead us with Thy wisdom, sustain us by Thy strength. And be to us as the shadow of a mighty rock within a weary land. We ask this in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I wish to ask unanimous consent for my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON], chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for leave to extend his remarks on a bill which he has introduced to-day, an act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States." Mr. STEENERSON is with the joint committee in New York, and for that reason he asked me to present this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] may extend his remarks on the subject indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent, after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] shall have addressed the House, that I may speak for 20 minutes on the subject of the league of nations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 20 minutes on the league of nations after the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would say to the gentleman that there are several other bills of considerable importance to come up to-day. I hope that the gentleman will not for the time being make that request. It may be that we can not get through with those bills to-day, and it is very important that they should be passed. If the gentleman will reserve his request until later——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I shall withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker, for the present.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that I expect to discuss a legal question, for 10 minutes' additional time without stopping to ask for it, and then I shall endeavor to finish.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for 10 minutes so that he may have 25 minutes instead of 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, some months ago I introduced a resolution to ascertain the reason why American troops were sent to Siberia. From that time until the present the condition has been aggravated rather than bettered. The President of the United States, as I shall show, in absolute usurpation of his power, not only sent our troops, in connection with Japan, into Siberia, but since the armistice was signed he has continued to keep our troops there and now announces through the War Department—for the Secretary of War was before the committee of which I am a member and stated that he did not intend to return the troops from Siberia until volunteers were found to take their places. In view of the fact that for the last nine months they have been giving out direct and indirect statements that our boys were to be returned from Siberia, I asked the Secretary of War why it was necessary to censor their letters. He said that he did not know that they were censored, and I should not speak of this except it was in open session before the committee. I then told him that they were censored, and I have received letters showing that they have been censored. He then said that that was very right; that in times of peace men ordered to police duty in foreign countries and against which country we had never declared war our boys should have their mail censored. I say to you that our boys are not properly fed and cared for, and I have no desire to apologize for taking your time, for 4,000 out of the 8,000 in Siberia are all American citizens who live in my district, and they are there without any right and in absolute violation of the constitutional limitations upon presidential power. I purpose in a minute to read to you from the President's own book, which shows where he makes his first great mistake. It shows that he started upon the wrong track when considering executive power and considering the constitutional limitations of executive power. His proposition that we read from his lectures and from his book published since he has been President, and evidently delivered while he was president of a college, says this:

> One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all: His control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of the United States. The initiative in foreign affairs—

I ask you now to observe this—> which the President possesses without any restrictions whatever, is virtually the power to control them absolutely.

I purpose to put in deadly parallel with those two propositions the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, of Mr. Webster, of Mr. Clay, and of Mr. Rawle, whom every lawyer agrees was a great writer on the constitutional limitations of the President of the United States. Now, no man who has written since Rawle has disagreed with him upon the fundamental rules laid down in his great work upon the Constitution of the United States.

The President makes two propositions: "The initiative in foreign affairs" the President possesses without any restrictions whatever. It is absolutely false; it is not well grounded in law; and his conduct in sending troops to Russia shows that he is following his false construction which he gathered while he was a professor of a great school, and which is in violation of the law of this land. Rawle says:

> The legislature, indeed, possesses a superior power, and may declare its dissent from the Executive in the recognition or refusal to recognize a nation.

THE DEADLY PARALLEL.

Woodrow Wilson:	Rawle on Constitution:
I have power to "initiate in foreign affairs without any restriction whatever."	The legislature possesses a superior power.
Wilson:	The Constitution:
I have "power to control them absolutely." Virtually. When I complete a treaty "the Government is virtually committed."	"By and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Webster and Clay while Members of the House both introduced resolutions—see Life and Speech of Clay and Webster—to recognize other Republics, Clay for Buenos Aires and Webster for Greece, in 1823. The argument in each case sustains Rawle and is in direct conflict with Mr. Wilson. Another marked precedent. In 1836 Andrew Jackson was President and refused to recognize the independence of the Republic of Texas. He sent a message to Congress insisting that it was his business and Congress had nothing to do with it. The Senate immediately passed a resolution recognizing the independence of the Republic of Texas. The House passed a resolution making an appropriation for a representative to Texas from the United States. Old Hickory changed his mind and appointed a minister and received one from Texas to the United States.

If at any time before the President acted the question of the existence of the Republic of Texas had been raised the Supreme Court would have recognized that republic by reason of the action of Congress.

The recognition of a nation in its inception is the initiative in foreign affairs. The President says he possesses that power without any restriction. Let me read you what the Supreme Court of the United States says, and I will insert some things here so as to save time:

3 Wheaton. Mr. Justice Marshall says:

> The judiciary can take no notice of a new government until either—the Congress, that is—the legislative or the executive has acted.

As a matter of fact, the theory of President Wilson in regard to his control of foreign affairs is not only wrong in law but wrong in precedent, and I intend to insert here the opinion of Mr. Webster when he introduced a resolution declaring in favor of the Republic of Greece about 100 years ago, when he gave as his argument—and I ask those of you who wish to be students in a public sense to read his opinion. He insisted, and truthfully, that the legislature had power to recognize foreign States, and that it was not purely an executive function but it was a governmental function, in which the initiative might be taken either by the executive or legislative branch. And Mr. Webster in his learned debate and argument cites his authority and offers his resolution recommending that an appropriation be made, for representatives from the United States to Greece, and this authority is in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Clay offered a resolution asking for an appropriation to give to the people a diplomatic corps to Buenos Aires. He gives as his argument that the recognition of a foreign nation is not purely an executive function; that it is a governmental function.

And let me say just in passing, and fearing any of my colleagues on this side of the House, or, rather, in this House of Representatives, shall fear that you are invading the sanctity of senatorial power, let me say to you that the House of Representatives is a part of this Government, and, according to Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay both, even if the Senate ratified a treaty, the House of Representatives must be consulted, and if we fail to make the appropriation necessary the treaty may fail, for the very reason that we hold the purse strings, and there is an appeal to the conscience of this Government through the House of Representatives, whose Members come newest and freshest from the people, and if we fail to do our duty the people have the final say.

And I will simply say in passing that so far as I am concerned, I do not care what treaty is ratified in the Senate of the United States, I never will vote for an appropriation that establishes a superstate, and gives one of the superstates six judges to our one. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will never vote for an appropriation—I do not care whether the Senate passes it or not—which guarantees that this country shall prevent the birth of a new republic anywhere and furnish men in uniform and under the American flag to fight under the direction of anybody in the world but that man who is constituted the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It will be interesting to know, you who are students of law, the reason given by the Supreme Court and Mr. Rawle that the President has not the power and the Congress has, and if you will permit me——

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow me just one moment in pursuit of his argument?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Does not the word "initiative" contemplate the action by one party in the first instance?

Mr. MASON. I do not think we have any dispute about what the word "initiative" means. The President of the United States says he has absolute and unrestrained power, and I say that he is wrong. The Supreme Court says he is wrong, and Mr. Rawle says he is wrong, that he has not the monopoly of the power of initiative.

Mr. DEWALT. I grant you that that is true, possibly, but——

Mr. MASON. The gentleman will pardon me. This comes out of my time. I will be very glad to give the gentleman the time if I can get only five minutes more.

Mr. DEWALT. It was only in pursuit of your argument.

Mr. MASON. I must pursue it in my own way and in my own time. I recognize the gentleman intends to be fair, but you know how we are fixed in this body.

And so you get the reason for the rule that the initiative is not wholly an executive function, but is a legislative one as well; and the reason given by the great writers and students of this act is that the war-making power is here and that the President can not make war without a declaration of war by Congress. Therefore, in the exercise of our power which may create war or be a casus belli, the executive power is inferior to that of the legislative power of the United States.

The President of the United States entered into an arrangement with Japan to send troops to Siberia. I speak advisedly as to what was done. Japan and the United States afterwards invited the other Allies to participate. This was done upon the pretext that we had property to protect in Archangel. The pretext is a pretext and is not true and never was true. When the Secretary of War was before the committee the other day in open session—and there is nothing secret or executive about it—he said that they were there to guard a railroad. Now, the questions is, Whose railroad is it? I charged here a month ago that we were sacrificing boys in Siberia as collection agencies, and they are there ostensibly to guard a railroad; they are performing the duty not only of policemen but of laborers; and there are 4,000 of them from my district who are there, and they are not being properly fed, and they have no business there. The President of the United States has assumed to declare war against a friendly people. It is a declaration of war. He sends our soldiers there. We do not send soldiers under the American flag, wearing the American uniform, either for policemen on the Rhine or watchmen in Silesia or scavengers in Siberia. We ought not to do it, but that is what you are doing, and the Congress is silent.

Here is a poster issued by the War Department. The Secretary of War said the other day that they were enlisting men who volunteered to go to Siberia. I do not care whether they volunteered or not. You might just as well take a million volunteers to go to Ireland and help Ireland without any action of Congress. Says the poster:

Notice the large type.

"War is not yet finished in Russia." A few white men with previous service only are wanted in the United States Army. "Do your full duty now."

Here are the places where they are expected to enlist: In Brunswick, Ga.; Greenville, S. C.; Charleston, S. C.; Columbia, and Florence.

WAR IS NOT FINISHED IN RUSSIA.

A few white men with previous service only are wanted in the United States Army for service in the Infantry and Medical Department for immediate service in American Expeditionary Forces in Siberia.

Do your full duty now.

Apply for enlistment at 35 Barnard Street, Savannah, Ga.; post-office building, Brunswick, Ga.; 202½ North Main Street, Greenville, S. C.; 148½ Morgan Square, Spartanburg, S. C.; 177 Meeting Street, Charleston, S. C.; 1522 Main Street, Columbia, S. C.; post-office building, Florence, S. C.

Since August 16, 100,000 recruits—1,034 expressed willingness to go to Siberia. (RECORD, p. 4899.)

War is not yet over in Russia. Whose war is it? Who declared war in Russia? Was not Russia our ally? Is she not our friend? The President of the United States declares war. He takes the boys from my district, without any right, without any let or hindrance, without any authority from Congress. By the newspaper I read 23 were killed last week in Siberia. I do not know whether it is true or not. It is a delayed dispatch. I have just asked Gen. Harris about it, and he said he would let me know. They do not have official information as to this last battle. Four hundred and eighty were killed in the Archangel sector. War in Siberia! Whose war is it? Have you voted for a declaration of war? Do you believe under the Constitution of the United States that the President has the power to take the boys of this country and send them into a peaceful nation to take part in a civil war there in progress? I am not for the Bolsheviki, and I am not for the spawn of the Czar under Kolchak. Neither one of them is under my flag. Neither of them wears the uniform of my country. But 4,000 boys from my district are there, not the sons of rich men. I want to say if the President had a boy there, even if the son-in-law of the President were among them—in the Y. M. C. A. business—it would not take him long to take them out of Siberia and start them home. [Applause.] That is the truth about it. They are my constituents. They are in my office when I am there. They are in my house when I am there. Their petitions come in, hour by hour, and this morning comes a dispatch saying that 26 of the Yankees were killed. Killed by whose order? That of the President of the United States, who, believing that he was right when he was a professor and wrote that the President had the right of initiative and the right to control the power of all initiative—I have quoted his words—that the President of the United States has virtually the power to control absolutely the foreign affairs of the United States. Acting upon that, he assumes to declare war; acting upon that, he is recruiting men for service in Siberia, where we have not declared war, where we are using our boys as a collection agency.

The Secretary of War told us it was to defend a railroad. Whose railroad, in the name of God, is it? Have you stock there? Are you willing to fight for it? Then go and fight for it, but do not take my boys over there to fight for your dirty stock and your dirty bonds and your dirty railroads. [Applause.] Four hundred million dollars, I believe, of American money from one bank of the Standard Oil has gone to the Archangel railroad. Do you see any connection between the blood of the boys of Illinois and the railroad bonds and stock in Siberia? Eight thousand men are left in Siberia to control and organize and reorganize a country where there are 180,000,000 people.

What military asininity is it to send 15,000 American boys there in an attempt to control the affairs where, if any one of these dirty factions agrees with the other, if the Bolsheviki should meet to-morrow the Kolchaks and, after they had got all the money they can get out of the United States, should come to an agreement, they would turn and murder your boys and mine as quick as they would kill a cat or a dog. And you know it, and I want them to come out of there, and they have got to come out of there. [Applause.]

The resolution which I have offered cites the fact that the Congress of the United States has power to make rules and regulations—I will not attempt to quote it with verbal accuracy, but you can read it—the Congress of the United States has the right to make rules and regulations governing the Army and Navy and the armed and naval forces of the United States. You have the power to bring them out. I ask you by this resolution to order them out. Do not be afraid, in the name of God, to exercise the power of the legislator when the Executive usurps your power.

I do not care for the money that has been stolen. I do not care for the $150,000 which the President handed to Barney Baruch over there in the peace conference. It is dirt. But the blood of the boys of the United States cries to you. They are blood of our blood and bone of our bone. They are American boys. They are poor boys. They are the sons of poor parents. You told me that the sons of rich men were going into the draft. The rich man's sons are not over there. Those who are over there are the sons of the poor people, among them those whom I represent. You have no right to keep them there and starve them and kill them to gratify the whims of the President of the United States, who seeks to make himself king of the United States, and not President. [Applause.]

Here is the account of the 23 that were last murdered. Who is going to answer? Are you a Member of Congress? The Constitution gave you power to make rules. For God's sake let us make a rule and bring back all the American boys to this side that still live out of the countries with which we are at peace. That means Russia. We never declared war there. Kolchak and that crowd have got a box car. They telegraph for more money. Why, the Secretary of War stated the other day before the committee in this open meeting—and if it was executive I should not repeat it—said they had not declared war on Russia, but they were sending arms and ammunition and supplies to Kolchak—Kolchak, the scum of the Czar. It is a shake of the dice between him and Lenin and Trotski. There is no difference. It is a good, fair fight between that class of men. Why in the name of God do you want to put American boys over there? Why do you want to stain the American uniform? Why do you want to starve them along the Siberian road and be silent, when I tell you that the Constitution gives you power to act? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, how many minutes have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman know how many Japanese allies we have fighting with our men in Siberia?

Mr. MASON. The Japanese got us into it. The Japanese agreed with the United States—those two—to go in. They, the United States and Japan, invited England and Italy and France to go in. Japan agreed to send only the same number of men as the others, totaling about 15,000. Japan, in her usual way of keeping treaties and agreements, and violating her agreement with the President of the United States, sent 60,000 or 70,000 men there for the purposes of conquest. They are the people that got us into this dirty work.

A MEMBER. Seventy-five thousand.

Mr. MASON. Seventy-five thousand. Here is a sample of the way the money is being spent. Here is a whole-page advertisement asking us to recognize the Omsk government. If we would recognize it, I might not complain. It is possibly an improvement on Lenin and Trotski. I do not think so. I do not know and you do not know. There are 40 factions there, fighting like a lot of cats and dogs; and I say to you, Mr. President Wilson, you had better conserve your resources. If the President has a good friend in this House, let him say to the President, "We have stood everything in the world. We are complaining of but one thing now. You had better conserve your resources." He can say what he wants to about the Senate or the "contemptible quitters" or the "unscrupulous quitters." I do not know just what that means. He uses some poker language that I do not understand. He got poker and euchre mixed up, but Barney Baruch could set him right; and when he put $150,000 into Barney Baruch's hands over there, I think Barney had had a bad night with the boys the night before. [Laughter.]

All I have got to say is this: My boys are over there. They are bone of my bone and blood of my blood, as they are of yours, just as much your constituents as mine. They have a right to come out. They can not even write to their fathers and mothers. Occasionally they will slip a letter through by some friend coming over. I have a box full of letters where half the letter has been cut out. They are starving; they are dying. They have the uniform of your country, the uniform of an American soldier. My God, what does it mean? It means that they march in uniform under the flag in the defense of American ideals, and one American ideal is that we will never declare war against a nation until the people of the United States have spoken through the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute to answer a question. I want to get some information.

Mr. HAMILTON. Give him more than one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Assuming that the gentleman is correct about that one proposition, that Congress alone can declare war and that Congress may by appropriate action recall troops, I infer that the gentleman has a resolution before the Committee on Military Affairs to withdraw the troops from Russia. Is that true?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Now, the gentleman's party is in power. Why does it not bring that resolution out here and give us a chance to vote on it? Why does not the gentleman move to discharge the committee? I will say that, as far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for this side—we are ready to vote on that proposition. Get your committee that is in charge to give you favorable report on your resolution, with the facts. Then we can act intelligently. Give less talk and more action. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JUUL. The question is whether we are capable right here and now of voting that resolution out of that committee and putting it on its passage now? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas very generously gave me a minute and then took it away from me. Now I ask for another.

Mr. WINGO. I ask that the gentleman have a minute to answer my question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman only asked for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. MASON. I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs have only had this resolution for the past three or four days. I did not introduce it until after the Secretary of War had stated that they did not intend to bring my boys home until they could get volunteers to take their places. I looked it up, and I found from the statement made by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate that 100,000 boys have enlisted, and 1,000 have agreed to go to Siberia; so I made up my mind that I do not want my boys to wait for volunteers to go there. I have no desire to be discourteous to the Committee on Military Affairs. On the contrary, if the resolution is not reported within the time specified by the rules of the House, I give notice now that I intend to move, under the rules of the House, to discharge the committee and place the resolution upon its passage. [Applause.]

Where you going to get the soldiers and the money for Silesia, Armenia, and Siberia?

I set out here the clever statement of Hon. JOHN N. TINCHER, a Congressman from Kansas.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1919.

MY DEAR EDITOR: Recently I have had many letters regarding the league of nations. Some think, as a Congressman, I have a vote on it, which, of course, I have not, but being here perhaps I can give your readers a little inside on it.

There are three classes of Senators on the league:

First. Those that are for it.

Second. Those that are for it with reservations.

Third. Those that are against it.

During this last week the second class have gained from the first class, and this is true of men changing from the first to the second class who belong to the same party as the President.

Now, this will seem strange to some, especially so in view of the fact that the President has received great ovations and kind treatment everywhere he has stopped.

I am going to explain to you why these changes. They are not due to anything the President has said or done on the trip.

Everyone, of course, understands that there has not been any discussion yet by Congress as to the permanent peace policy for our Army and Navy. Before the President left here he, with his departments, outlined their policy, and the bills were introduced in both the Senate and House by the respective committees. These bills cover 42 pages of printed matter. They were prepared by the General Staff, and the day the President left here Gen. March testified that they were absolutely in accord for this bill—that is, President Wilson, Secretary Baker, Gen. March, and on down the line. On page 26 of this bill the size of the enlisted army is fixed at about one-half million. On page 32 of this bill is the compulsory military training provision for all boys at the nineteenth birthday, and on page 40 is the provision for each boy remaining a part of the Army in a way for two years. After the two years he can not be called without his consent in peace time, but during that two years he could be called by the President for any duty.

Under existing law there is no such provision; that is, the President alone could not send American boys abroad without a declaration of war by Congress.

However, within 10 days they have sent 5,000 boys to Silesia; this they claim they have a right to do, as peace has not been declared.

The 19-year-old boys, they claim, will average 600,000 a year, or it would give the United States 1,200,000 subject to the call of the President at all times.

There are 20 wars now raging in foreign countries concerning the merits of which there is not one man in 50,000 knows one thing.

These bills have been hinted at a long time, but the details and the administration's attitude were not fully known until this week. So don't be surprised if more Senators change from the first to the second class.

All are agreed that they want to keep out of war, but they disagree as to how to keep out.

As I said in the beginning, I have no vote on the league, but I will have a vote on this Army bill, and I will never vote for such a bill; also permit me to add that these bills will never pass, and I doubt if they ever get out of committee.

The expense of maintaining the Army and Navy under the proposed bills would be about twice the total of prewar operating expense of the Government per annum, in other words, it would cost twice as much for the Army and Navy every year as the total expense of the whole Government was before the war.

The reservations as agreed to by the Senate committee will, they claim, do away with the necessity for all of this and leave it so that we can have an Army like we had before the war.

Yours, truly,

Mr. Wilson, you ask some of the contemptible quitters to offer an improvement on your "league of hallucinations." If you will permit me, I suggest an improvement would be made if you will give us your 14 points.

"Open covenants of peace openly arrived at." You abandoned that doctrine the moment you got your feet under the royal mahogany.

"After which there shall be no private international understandings." You have abandoned that by negotiating treaties which you decline to furnish even to the Senate.

You say there shall be "absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas." You have consented to a treaty which makes more binding forever the song you sang as a child in your English home, "Rule, Britannia, Rule the Seas."

You demanded the removal of "all economic barriers." By your treaty if the United States fails to submit the Monroe doctrine to arbitration we would be commercially outlawed by all the world.

Your point to "reduce national armaments" has resulted in a request by you for the largest standing Army and Navy we have ever had, and every nation in the world is increasing its armament. And you want a million and a half of men to carry out your league to establish peace.

Your point in regard to "self-determination" has been wickedly abandoned by you, and you have entered into a treaty whereby no new republic shall ever be born, and pledge the faith and honor of the United States that should such a child be born, we, a free people, agree to strangle it.

How does your self-determination read in Shantung, South Africa, Egypt, India, and Ireland?

You demand in the next point the "evacuation of all Russian territory." All except the Russians have evacuated, except you and the Mikado, and you are freezing and starving our sons there by usurpation of Executive power, to protect the capital invested in the railroads and to force the people to guarantee to pay the ancient debts of Russia.

You demand as your fourteenth point a "general association of nations." You have abandoned that, sir, by making a "special" association, which is an alliance to promote war and not a league to promote peace.

Five hundred American boys are buried in Russia or Siberia by the usurpation of power by you, and if you could look into the faces of the unhappy mothers and wives of these dead soldiers, if you could walk by their open graves and see the result of your work, you might have a better conception of your duty toward the American youth and eventually get into your mind that the Constitution of the United States limits the power of the President.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BOIES. I ask to address the House for 15 minutes to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table on the question of what, it seems to me, was unjust criticism by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in accusing me of putting matter into the RECORD that amounted to nothing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand the gentleman wishes to reply to the speech made by the minority leader [Mr. CLARK of Missouri]?

Mr. BOIES. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that he wait until the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] comes back. I understand he will be here to-morrow.

Mr. BOIES. He will be here to-morrow? All right; I will be glad to wait until the gentleman from Missouri is present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the gentleman had better wait until he is here.

EXPENSES OF MILITARY AFFAIRS INQUIRY.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 279.

Resolved, That there be appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as it may be found necessary for the expenses of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, appointed to visit and inspect designated camps, cantonments, and aviation fields with a view to considering the feasibility of their purchase by the Government.

The expenses that may be incurred by the said subcommittee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers signed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, or the chairman of the said subcommittee, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced at the request of the Committee on Military Affairs, who have appointed a subcommittee to visit cantonments, camps, and aviation fields, I am informed, at the request of the War Department, with a view to ascertaining which of them, if any, are feasible for purchase and rebuilding and which should not pass into the hands of the Government, many of them being now held on lease. Now, if there is no question or any debate, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that in the first line there is obviously an omission.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the resolution by inserting the word "may" and also inserting the word "be."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "there" insert the word "be," and in line 3 strike out the word "many" and insert the word "may."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMPILER OF HINDS' PRECEDENTS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present another privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 273.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for by law, compensation at the rate of $4,600 per annum, payable monthly, to Clarence A. Cannon for his services as editor and compiler of the Precedents of the House of Representatives.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be empowered and authorized to appoint an editor and compiler of Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, to revise, extend, and continue said work to the present date, at a salary not to exceed $4,600 per annum, payable monthly, and that such sum is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House for this purpose.

Provided, That such work shall be completed within the period of one year from the date that such appointment is made, and that compensation for the services of such editor and compiler shall cease with the expiration of that date.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, unless there is some debate on the question I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What was the date of the last compilation?

Mr. IRELAND. Nineteen hundred and seven. I think we are down to that date now.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JANE A. LEWIS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 255.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Jane A. Lewis, widow of Hugh Lewis, late an employee of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said Hugh Lewis.

The resolution was agreed to.

J. M. M'KEE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 232.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, additional compensation at the rate of $500 per annum, payable monthly, for services of J. M. McKee, foreman of the folding room, House of Representatives.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 3, after the word "of," strike out the figures "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$300."

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will there be any opportunity to debate the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The time is in the control of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. IRELAND. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman to withhold the consideration of this resolution until to-morrow until I had my data from the office, but it is very apparent from the method adopted by this gentleman in the folding room that his salary ought not to be, in all fairness, increased. The gentleman has made a practice, having been here a long time, of diverting Government publications that belong to the allotments of different Members to other Members and otherwise distributing them and then notifying the Member that his supply is exhausted.

I do not know whether any other Members of this House have had a similar experience, but I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] lost 1,500 yearbooks. I know I have lost 1,500 yearbooks, and I would like any other Members on the floor of the House who have lost similar publications through this method to get up and express themselves. It is possible that I may be the only man that has been injured in that way. But time after time, day after day and month after month, publications in that department disappear and are not available to the membership, and before I would ever vote to increase this gentleman's salary I would like to have some report on that subject by a committee.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I brought that matter to the attention of the committee, and I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that only a small proportion of the full allotment of yearbooks are printed at a time and the entire amount placed to the credit of each Member? If he does not use them within a certain time, those books are not taken from the press.

Mr. KING. I will say to the gentleman that it may be true that perhaps not the full quota has been printed, but after a Member is advised on a printed card that he is entitled to 1,500 yearbooks he is entitled to have them until the day he goes out of Congress, and the trouble with this gentleman down there is that he disposed of those 1,500 yearbooks without serving any notice on the membership that he intended to dispose of them, and he has never answered the question as to what he did with the 1,500 yearbooks.

Mr. IRELAND. I agree with the gentleman entirely, but is not the system wrong rather than the employee?

Mr. KING. But he has no right to dispose of my yearbooks and give them to somebody else. I do not have to stand for the default of the Printing Office.

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly not, but is that the fact? Did he place the gentleman's books to the credit of some other Member?

Mr. KING. He certainly took them away from me without notice. Every man is entitled to notice in this country. You can not take a judgment against a man in any court without notice, and even God Almighty, in the Garden of Eden, went out and first served notice on Adam before he took judgment against him by saying, "Adam, where art thou?"

Mr. IRELAND. That is certainly a wonderful comparison.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that I lost my yearbooks in a similar manner.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And I lost mine, and I expect two-thirds of this membership has done the same thing, and the foreman is doing this in violation of law and in violation of the office that he is holding.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois tell us how the gentleman in the folding room disposed of these yearbooks? I do not think he disposed of any yearbooks. They were not printed.

Mr. KENDALL. They should have been printed.

Mr. BROWNING. But they were not.

Mr. IRELAND. I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] to appear before the committee this morning, and he failed to do so. If he had, I would have called the employee in question.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman give me two or three minutes?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I have known Mr. McKee for a number of years. He has been here as long as I have, and many years, in all probability, before I came, and, in my opinion, a more painstaking and better man for the position can not be found in the United States. He has been retained by both Democrats and Republicans. I do not believe he has ever disposed of a single book excepting under the law. There is only one instance that I know of in respect to yearbooks, so far as I am concerned, where I have failed to get all that was coming to me. These yearbooks are not disposed of by the foreman of the folding room. They are not printed at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not accuse this man of it, but how is it that you can purchase yearbooks and all other kinds of Government publications from every Tom, Dick, and Harry around the Capitol?

Mr. BROWNING. For the simple reason that city Members who have them, who do not use them, give those people the right to sell them. I have to get them myself. I beg from Members, because I have not nearly enough of my own quota to go around.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As I understand it, when there is a certain publication of yearbooks, whatever number may be published, they are distributed equally to the membership pro rata.

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Some of the Members, those who take theirs and take them to their offices immediately, get all their quota, while those who wait until there is a demand for them and then send in their order blanks are the ones who have not been able to get them. Here is the trouble, here is where they have been showing favoritism, in not keeping the quota assigned to each Member until he exhausts it.

Mr. BROWNING. It may be that the quota was not kept; but it could not be kept, because the books have not been printed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have been printed.

Mr. DOWELL. Why are they given credit for them if they are not printed?

Mr. BROWNING. Because they are given credit from the quota that you are supposed to have.

Mr. DOWELL. Does he not check up when he receives the books, so that he knows how many he has received?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not know that he checks up the books.

Mr. DOWELL. He ought to check up from the books received, or there ought to be a man there to take his place who will do it.

Mr. BROWNING. I doubt very much whether you can find a more competent man in the United States for the place.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to say that he does not check up at all.

Mr. KING. When there is a shortage, why should it be taken off two or three Members?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not think they are.

Mr. KING. Why should they not be prorated?

Mr. BROWNING. I had only one shortage in all my experience here.

Mr. KING. Does not the gentleman think that it is evidence of inefficiency and reason for not giving this man additional salary, because he does not keep track of the yearbooks?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not agree with the gentleman; I do not think he is inefficient. I know he is very efficient.

Mr. KING. He has been there too long.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The fact of the matter is, as I get the information, if a certain number is printed, and you are lucky enough to ask for your quota, you get it. The foreman of the folding room does not know that the Printing Office is going to let down on printing yearbooks. After you have your books another man may come along and he can not get his. The fault is not in the folding room; it is with the Printing Committee and the amount appropriated. That is where the trouble comes in in this matter, and it is not fair to jump on the foreman if it is a condition over which he has no control. There is a superintendent in charge of the folding room.

Mr. IRELAND. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BOX. If the gentleman pleases, it is not confined to the yearbook. I would state that I had an allotment of other documents, called for them within 60 days, have had none of them, and was advised that my supply had been exhausted or that the supply had been exhausted.

Mr. KING. Without notice?

Mr. IRELAND. Those were Farmers' Bulletins?

Mr. BOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEE. How long has this gentleman been in that office?

Mr. IRELAND. Thirty-six years, I believe.

Mr. BOX. He does not belong to this side of the House, then.

Mr. KING. That side of the House ruined him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. The foreman of the folding room does not control Farmers' Bulletins.

Mr. IRELAND. Complaint was made of some nature——

Mr. GALLAGHER. It is a different matter altogether.

Mr. DOWELL. I desire to inquire if the committee have made any investigation to ascertain if these books have been printed by the Government Printing Office?

Mr. IRELAND. The Doorkeeper informs me that they have not, but we were unable to get in touch with the chairman of the Committee on Printing, who is out of town at present.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that it is possible when a certain order is made with the Public Printer that he does not furnish the quota that is ordered by Congress?

Mr. IRELAND. I believe unofficially they endeavor to indulge in some economy when the quota is not demanded by some Members, and probably without the right to do so.

Mr. DOWELL. But on the question of the yearbooks there should certainly be no question about the printing of the number wanted. Certainly there ought to be no question that they should be printed up to the quota given Members of Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. That seems to be proper.

Mr. DOWELL. And then I want to know how they can be taken away by this officer except by some other act rather than his own?

Mr. IRELAND. So far as the committee was able to understand they do not condone the system in vogue at all. We did not think the employee guilty himself of a time-honored practice that should not be indulged in longer. I am very glad this matter has been brought up. The same thing obtains, I understand, in the publication of the Farmers' Bulletins, and perhaps we may be given some protection in these publications in the future we have not had in the past and perhaps our privileges will not be abused. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. A minute or two?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I have had the same experience mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen on the floor. My recollection is that it was the yearbook of 1916, or was it 1915?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. 1915 and 1916.

Mr. RUCKER. I made some investigation and the information I obtained was that the appropriation for the printing of the yearbook was inadequate and that the number allotted to Members could not be printed because of the advance in the price of material. The Public Printer used the amount of money available and then ceased printing and hence those of us who had not called for books did not get the yearbooks on those occasions.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. In just a minute I will be glad to yield. The gentleman, whose name I think has not been called but referred to, is the foreman of the folding room, and, as stated a while ago, he does not belong to this side of the House, although after I had been here for 10 years I still thought he was a Democrat, because I found him at all times genial, affable, courteous, and efficient. [Applause.] So, of course, I thought he was a Democrat. I want to stand here as a Democrat and protect him against any accusation of misconduct. [Applause.] My notion, Mr. Speaker, is that it is unbecoming and unfair for the membership of this House to engage any official and then avail ourselves of the freedom of speech in denouncing a man who is as efficient and as honest and as honorable as any man, I think, on this floor. [Applause.] And I say that although I know now to my regret that he is a Republican.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that we had the same difficulty with the Farmers' Bulletins?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly, years ago we had some.

Mr. GALLAGHER. We do now.

Mr. RUCKER. I have enough on hand right now to answer my demands; so I have not had that experience.

But let me say again that if this gentleman is not efficient the Republican Party, which selected and engaged him years ago, made a mistake; the Democratic Party, which retained him, made a mistake; and you who have retained him have made the same mistake again if any mistake has been made. There is an explanation of this matter, a reasonable explanation which ought to satisfy the mind of any man, and I think the whole thing lies in the fact that the appropriations which we have made were not sufficient to print the number of yearbooks which we expected to receive and which heretofore we have been receiving.

Mr. KING. Should not this gentleman have discovered the fact and prorated the list? Why should a few Members of the House stand the whole loss?

Mr. RUCKER. How could he prorate after the books were exhausted?

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman know who got the 1,500——

Mr. RUCKER. I do not know; it is only an estimate. I do not want to make an accusation against you, but I am sure you Republicans must have gotten them. I simply desired to say this much in behalf of the foreman, because I regard him as one of the efficient men around this Capitol.

Mr. IRELAND. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—ZONING COMMISSION.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I call up the bill (H. R. 6863) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes; and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. I do not know of any desire for general debate on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6863) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to protect the public health, secure the public safety, and to protect property in the District of Columbia there is hereby created a zoning commission, which shall consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, which said commission shall have all the powers and perform all the duties hereinafter specified and shall serve without additional compensation. Such employees of the government of the District of Columbia as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act shall be assigned to such duty by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia without additional compensation.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I would like to know, if this bill were included or enacted into law, if there would be any controversy as to authority between the so-called zoning commission and the Fine Arts Commission, which regulates certain buildings, roads, and monuments in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. My understanding is that the Fine Arts Commission has a different function to perform. It recommends the park system and the general plan of building in the District of Columbia, but this commission would have authority to regulate the use, area, and height of buildings on private property.

Mr. GARD. I recall very distinctly, and therefore I am asking the question of the gentleman, that as late as a year ago there was a great deal of question, to which the public print in Washington gave attention, regarding the erection of some powerhouse buildings in the District of Columbia—I believe at some place down on Fourteenth Street—about which it was argued as to whether or not the Fine Arts Commission had authority to regulate the size of smokestacks. It was claimed that they did have the placing of these buildings of public utility, if not of ornamentation, and I am asking whether there be any conflict of authority between that commission and the zoning commission?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, as I understood it, the Fine Arts Commission had no real control over the buildings that the gentleman speaks of. The members of that commission conducted a campaign throughout the country to get Congress to prohibit placing the power plant where it was. If this bill should pass and be enacted into law, then the zoning commission would have the right to say whether or not any particular piece of property could be used for the purposes of a power plant.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that with the almost concurrent authority, and the fact that the Fine Arts Commission has for its purpose a continuing duty in the city of Washington, which is a very beautiful city, and should remain so as the Capital of the Nation, it should have representation upon the zoning commission? I see that the zoning commission is to consist of all the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman will realize that this zoning commission will be a working body, and the members will need to be here to take care of their duty. The members of the Fine Arts Commission, as I understand it, are here only occasionally. That commission recommends in a general way the policy for beautifying the District, but it has no real authority.

Mr. GARD. The zoning commission is not going to be very active, because there is no additional compensation carried in this bill. And I question the activity of a commission appointed by the Government unless there is additional compensation to spur them on to endeavor.

Mr. MAPES. Of course the members of the commission will be expected to perform their duty under this act, and it requires them to act within six months after its passage.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think the bill should be so amended as to include some representation of the Fine Arts Commission in this so-called zoning law?

Mr. MAPES. I do not, because it is merely an advisory body that has the study of the artistic side of these questions. I do not think any member of that commission should be a member of this one.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to inquire, Mr. Speaker, of the chairman of the committee whether this bill has any direct bearing on the correspondence we find inserted in the RECORD last week, on page 4825, between various people and the letter from the lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, C. W. Kutz, Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The correspondence has a direct bearing on a new apartment house to be built on Sixteenth Street, and Commissioner Kutz, in his letter, says:

But until an enabling act is passed vesting in the commissioners or in some independent commission the power to promulgate zoning regulations it seems most unwise to make public tentative plans, as every property owner dissatisfied with the proposed lines of demarkation would use his influence to defeat the legislation.

In other words, some one here, to my mind, seems to want authority to establish these zoning systems, and those to whom the authority is to be granted say that it would be very unwise to confide in the public or in Congress what their plans are until they get the authority. That looks to me like telling Congress, "You give us the authority and then we will do as we please with it." I would like to know whether this bill has any direct bearing on the possibility of trying to regulate the so-called apartment house now under construction on Sixteenth Street, about which objection is made as to its height.

Mr. MAPES. My attention had not been directed before to the correspondence to which the gentleman refers, but this bill was introduced and considered by the commissioners, as I understand it, long before there was any talk of an apartment house near the Meridian Hill Park, to which the gentleman refers. If this bill were a law, perhaps the zoning commission would be enabled to take care of that situation without any further legislation. As it is, I have introduced a resolution in the House, and a similar resolution has been introduced in the Senate, limiting the height of this proposed apartment house, which will obstruct the view at Meridian Park if put up as high as the plans now contemplate.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, of course, it is but fair to state, I think, that the objection being raised to the height of that building, because it will obstruct the view from Meridian Hill Park, is only the partial reason for objection. Quite likely the main reason for the objection comes from owners of other property in the neighborhood.

Mr. MAPES. The Fine Arts Commission has taken it up, and I do not think the members of that commission are interested in any private property around there, and they think that it would be very unwise and very unfortunate to have the apartment house put up to the height that it is contemplated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that there must be a very great demand for apartment houses in this city in view of the enormous rents that are being charged and the effort on the part of real estate owners to increase the rents of people now occupying apartment houses? Is there not a great demand for apartment houses? Why should the esthetic side stand in the way of people getting reasonable rents in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. Nobody would dispute the fact that there is a great demand for apartment houses here, but I do not think that one or two stories on the top of a 10-story apartment house are going to relieve in any great degree the demand for apartment houses. There are a great many vacant lots in the District of Columbia where apartments can be constructed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let us return once more to the original question. Is there any connection with the effort to secure this zoning system a desire to limit the height of that particular building, as evidenced by the correspondence to which I have referred?

Mr. MAPES. Not at all. But it is unfortunate that this bill is not now the law, so that the zoning commission could control that situation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not also unfortunate that the commissioner should say that it is unwise to give out what they expect to do in advance of the legislation of Congress?

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that the commissioner, like other people, sometimes writes letters in which he does not weigh his language very carefully, and it may be he was unfortunate in the expression which he used in that letter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. On page 1, line 8, strike out the word "and"; and on line 9, after the word "ground," insert "and the Fine Arts Commission."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On page 1, line 8, strike out the word "and"; and in line 9, after the word "grounds," insert "and the Fine Arts Commission."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to offer this amendment because of what has been suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] regarding the state of affairs in Washington to-day. We have had for some time a Fine Arts Commission. What its authority has been, it seems, is rather vague, but the purpose of the Fine Arts Commission is to preserve the architectural beauty of the city of Washington, and that, to my mind, is a most desirable thing.

Not long ago there unquestionably arose in the public mind the question of putting up buildings which might not be ornamental, although useful in the city of Washington, and that was brought directly to the attention of the membership of the Fine Arts Commission. Now, from what is stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Fine Arts Commission has again—to what extent I do not know—given attention to these matters, particularly the erection of a building on north Sixteenth Street, somewhere near the Meridian Hill Park. Of course, the Fine Arts Commission would have jurisdiction over the park, at least so far as recommendations to Congress are concerned regarding the upkeep and the general appearance of the park. Whether it now has jurisdiction in regard to the erection of private buildings I do not undertake to say. In fact I would think they would have no authority unless the building itself would trespass upon the utility of the park as a park.

But why not include them? Why not have the zoning system carried out by those who have in hand the practical side of it, such as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, together with the membership of the Fine Arts Commission as well, because there would seem to my mind to be no reason why practicality might not go hand in hand with beauty, why those who have charge of the actual management of affairs here might not take with them the proper consideration in these matters of those who have already been acting upon them in the District of Columbia—or more properly in the city of Washington—for quite some time, and those are the members of the Fine Arts Commission. There would be no additional compensation involved, since the bill says that those who act upon the commission and those delegated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall act without additional compensation. It would certainly mean a cooperation between this assembly of men who have due power to act under the bill and the personnel of that commission which for some years has had power to act under general law, as it appears now in chapter 243, established in the Sixty-first Congress; and it is for the purpose of having these two boards—if I may call them boards, if they are established—acting in unity and cooperation that I am offering the amendment that I do.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the Fine Arts Commission has one purpose. This zoning commission, which is proposed to be created by this bill, has another. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] offers an amendment which proposes to put all the members of the Fine Arts Commission on this zoning commission. The Fine Arts Commission looks to the artistic and aesthetic side, and acts in an advisory capacity.

This zoning commission will be an active body. This bill has been very carefully considered. In the drafting of it the citizens' associations and the board of trade and the local chapter of the American Institute of Architects and the builders and real estate men and the citizens generally of Washington were consulted. It was thought advisable to put on the commission the Commissioners of the District, and then the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the Superintendent of the Capital Building and Grounds. This will give the United States representation on the commission, as well as the District through the Commissioners of the District, and one of them, as everybody knows, is an engineer officer of the Army.

It seems to me it would be very unwise to put the members of this Fine Arts Commission on this zoning commission. The members of the Fine Arts Commission meet only temporarily. They are not citizens at all of the District. They come here at their leisure and stay as long as they find it convenient, and then go back to their respective homes. It would handicap materially the work of this zoning commission to have the Fine Arts men members of it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I just desire to be heard a moment.

Mr. MAPES. Could not the gentleman get in on another amendment? He has already discussed this amendment once.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to reply momentarily to a statement the gentleman has made.

Mr. MAPES. That would not be according to the rule. Could not the gentleman get in at some other time?

Mr. GARD. No. I want to talk about this particular thing.

Mr. MAPES. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GARD. Oh, two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the act creating the permanent Commission of Fine Arts it is provided that "It shall be the duty of the officers charged by law to determine such questions in each case when called for such advice." The advice referred to is the erection of statues, fountains, and monuments in the public streets and parks of the District, the selection of models for statues to be erected under the authority of the United States, and for the selection of artists for the execution of the same.

It further provides that these provisions shall not apply to the Capitol Building of the United States and the building of the Library of Congress, but it is to advise generally on questions of art when requested to do so by the President, or by any committee of either House of Congress, and it seems to me it might well be included in the present bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That wherever, under the provision of this act, it is required that a public hearing shall be held, notice of the time and place of such hearing shall be published for not less than 10 consecutive days in one or more newspapers of general circulation printed and published in the District of Columbia; and such public hearing may be adjourned from time to time: Provided, That if the time and place of the adjourned meeting is publicly announced when the adjournment is had, no further notice of such adjourned meeting need be published.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. In the first place it seems to me the language of section 3 should be made a little more clear by requiring that the meetings should be held in the District of Columbia, although that may be inferred from the language of the section. But what I am particularly desirous of knowing is whether under the language of section 4 and the subsequent and preceding language in the bill there is to be authority on the part of the zoning commission to prescribe a place where manufacturing may be done in the District of Columbia, referring to industrial manufacturing?

Mr. MAPES. As the law is now there is nothing to prevent an individual or a company from putting a manufacturing establishment anywhere in the city, and it is the purpose of this bill to regulate that, so that if any one desires to go into the manufacturing business he shall do it outside of the residence section and in the zone fixed for that purpose by the commission.

Mr. GARD. There is no large industrial manufacturing in the District of Columbia or, properly speaking, within the territorial limits of the city of Washington.

Mr. MAPES. That is true. If the gentleman means to inquire whether or not it is intended by this bill to promote manufacturing industries in the District of Columbia, I will say I have no knowledge of any such purpose, and I do not think that it is the purpose.

Mr. GARD. Not so long ago I read in the Washington newspapers items from certain trade organizations concerning a plan they have to bring industrial corporations and manufacturing concerns to the city of Washington, with the intention of increasing the population of Washington and the District of Columbia. Now, such an idea is entirely foreign to the primary use of the District of Columbia, which is that it shall be the capital residence of the whole of the United States of America, and there should be no entering wedge in this bill or any subsequent bill for the bringing here of industrial manufacturing enterprises. There is plenty of room outside. There are plenty of other places, and this District should be preserved for its primary use as the governmental residence of the United States.

Mr. MAPES. I agree with the gentleman perfectly, and I will say that this bill has no connection whatever with that, so far as I know. Of course, the executive officials of the association of which the gentleman speaks must have something to do. I have seen some statements about the bringing of manufacturing establishments here, but nobody, so far as I know, has any thought that that is going to be accomplished.

Mr. GARD. I refer to that because the gentleman said that those who were heard on the bill were members of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. MAPES. Among others they were heard.

Mr. GARD. What is the Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. MAPES. The retail merchants' organization here is misnamed the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association. As I understand it, that association consists entirely of retail merchants.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That said commission is authorized and empowered to make such orders and adopt such regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes and carry into effect the provisions of this act: Provided, That no order or regulation so adopted shall require any change in the plans, construction, or designated use of (a) a building for which a permit shall have been issued or plans for which shall be on file with the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia at the time the orders or regulations authorized under this act are promulgated; or (b) a permit for the erection of which shall be issued within 30 days after promulgation of the orders or regulations authorized or adopted under this act and the construction of which in either of the above cases shall have been diligently prosecuted within a year from the date of such permit and the ground-story framework of which, including the second tier of beams, shall have been completed within said year, and which entire building shall be completed according to such plans within two years of the date of the promulgation of such orders or regulations; or (c) prevent the restoration of a building wholly or partially destroyed by fire, explosion, act of God or the public enemy, or prevent the continuance of the use of such building or part thereof as such use existed at the time of such whole or partial destruction, or prevent a change of such existing use except under the limitations provided herein in relation to existing buildings and premises: Provided further, That no frame building that has been damaged by fire or otherwise more than one-half of its original value shall be restored within the fire limits as provided by the building regulations of the District of Columbia; or (d) prevent the restoration of a wall declared unsafe by the inspector of buildings of the District or by a board of survey appointed in accordance with any existing law or regulation.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining information. What is the reason for the proviso in section 5, especially the proviso marked (b), where reference is made to permits for the erection of buildings which shall be issued within 30 days after promulgation of the orders or regulations authorized or adopted under this act, as well as the provisos (a) and (c), because it seems to me that (a), (b), and (c) might well refer to particular cases. There might be some concealed joker herein with reference to a particular building or buildings. Proviso (c) reads as follows:

Prevent the restoration of a building wholly or partially destroyed by fire, explosion, act of God or the public enemy, or prevent the continuance of the use of such building or part thereof as such use existed at the time of such whole or partial destruction, or prevent a change of such existing use except under the limitations provided herein in relation to existing buildings and premises.

The only restriction being that it must be a frame building. In other words, under this law, if a frame building which it would not be proper to build in the first instance should be partially destroyed by fire, the zoning commission would have no power to prevent restoration in its form existing before the fire. If we create a zoning system at all, and if we confer power on these men to act as zone commissioners and to regulate the height of buildings and the place where they must be built and the character of their construction, why should we not afford them ample power and not restrict them in particular cases? And especially ought we not to leave them free in matters of restoration?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the matter is that these provisos were put in out of an abundance of caution on the part of the commissioners recommending the bill and particularly on the part of the committee reporting the bill, so that property rights should not be too much interfered with by this zoning commission, and that buildings already constructed or buildings for which plans have already been made should not be interfered with, but that the owners should be allowed to go ahead without interference by the zoning commission.

Mr. GARD. Let me say that if this zoning commission is to have any power, if it is going to do any work at all, you will find that the minute this bill passes, or within a short time thereafter, every man who has a building in contemplation, or any change in contemplation, is going to file an application for a permit under (a) or (b), or is going to try to come outside of the provisions of this proposed law.

It seems to me that the purpose of section 5, or the first part of it, before you get down to the proviso is ample. Where you say—

That said commission is authorized and empowered to make such orders and adopt such regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes and carry into effect the provisions of this act.

That is ample, but when you leave that and qualify it by provisions that might apply to particular things, are you not destroying the force of the bill you are trying to create?

I desire to call attention to the condition in the proviso (c), which absolutely places no restriction on a brick building, no matter how unworthy it may have been in an architectural sense or a substantial sense, no matter how illy adapted it may be for its purposes. A brick theater which would be condemned in the first instance under proviso (c) being partially destroyed by fire, the zone commissioners would have no power to prohibit the exact duplication in the restoration of that building. I know the gentleman wants to provide all possible protection to the building because the primary idea of the zone commission is to afford public protection. To say that in a certain locality a certain kind of building shall be erected in such a way for public protection, not the protection of the individual, but for the protection of the public, and therefore I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to exception (c) and ask him if he does not think that that can be eliminated?

Mr. MAPES. What the gentleman has said about the provisos in the bill appeals to me, but they were put in, as I said before, out of abundant caution. There are in our committee lawyers of a technical turn of mind, whose minds operate, however, differently from that of the gentleman from Ohio. They wanted the right of the zone in a commission to interfere with existing buildings and the rights of owners of property definitely defined, and rather insisted that these limitations be put in.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman will see that if he goes so far as to say there is nothing in the bill to prevent the restoration of a brick building inadequate for its purpose, the use of which in the first instance may have been improper, the bill amounts to nothing.

Mr. MAPES. Well, I would not agree with the gentleman in that statement.

Mr. GARD. This is what I am trying to get at: Suppose a moving-picture theater on F Street, or some other street, and they are all crowded now, has a fire. It is a brick or stone building and partially destroyed. After the fire it develops on investigation by the fire marshal, or whoever makes the investigation, that the building is improperly constructed, that the public benefit to the people who pay the money to go there is not subserved by that class of a building and that it is dangerous to human life. Still, under this bill the man who owns the building may rebuild it the same as he did before, and use it for the same purposes as he did before, although, as a matter of fact, a moving-picture building may be standing in between two other buildings and that is manifestly an improper surrounding for a moving-picture building. That is what I have in mind when I seriously call to the attention of the gentleman that if this bill is to have any benefit for the public, not to exploit somebody else, but if the public is to be protected this zone commission should have the power to see in a half-destroyed building when it 's rebuilt that it should be rebuilt in accordance with plans that will contribute to the public safety. If you carry out the provisions of paragraph "c" they could not do it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, of course, the rebuilding of a building would be under the jurisdiction of the building inspector and subject to the rules and regulations of the building law. But if it was rebuilt it would be in no worse condition than it was before. As far as I am personally concerned, I should have no objection to this provision being stricken out.

Mr. GARD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the language on page 5, after the semicolon, down to and including the colon in line 10, after the word "premises."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 5, beginning in line 3, after the semicolon and the word "regulations" strike out the balance of that line and lines 4 to 10, inclusive, up to the colon.

Mr. MAPES. To that I offer a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 4, after the word "dwelling," strike out the words "wholly or."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it might create a lot of unfairness if a building was to be entirely torn down and rebuilt after being partially destroyed. I think this would answer the gentleman's criticism very much better than the amendment he has just offered.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the substitute. I know the gentleman desires to act in accordance with what all believe would be the best interest for the public, but I do not believe the mere striking out of the words "wholly or" will meet the cases that I have suggested, because it leaves the language as follows:

or prevent the restoration of a building partially destroyed by fire, explosion, act of God, or the public enemy, or prevent the continuance of the use of such building—

And so forth.

In other words, unless the destruction was entire, if the destruction was three-fourths or seven-eighths, then, under the gentleman's substitute the gentleman can see, I am sure, that the very purpose he now says is a good purpose would be defeated. In other words, if a theater building—to refer to my original illustration—is seven-eighths destroyed and one-eighth remains, the entire building could be rebuilt, because it would come within the purview of the gentlemen's words—or prevent the restoration of a building partially destroyed by fire.

My objection to this language is a very sincere objection, and is based, as I think the gentleman understands, upon a public utility and public protection. In other words, I want this zoning system or this zoning commission to operate for the interest of the public, to prevent fire hazards, the loss of human life by fire, to prevent buildings falling down where great congregations of buildings are. It seems to me that the gentleman, upon reflection, will see that the elimination of the words "wholly or" will not carry out the purposes which he concedes are the true purposes, and that all of this language should be stricken out and that there should be conferred upon the zoning commissioners an honest discretion to investigate, examine, and recommend the rebuilding along proper lines of a wholly destroyed or even a partially destroyed building.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I just want to ask the gentleman this: Suppose a building is half destroyed by fire; then you will deprive that landowner of his vested property right there and say to him that he can not use the property as he formerly used it? That is what the committee had in mind in its efforts to protect the individual rights.

Mr. GARD. Not at all. Suppose the gentleman has a theater building and the roof is burned off. It appears that the roof was of improper construction, under the contention which the gentleman himself sanctions. Under this law the man could put the roof on in the same way it was before, the same character of roof, the same identical thing which in the first instance the gentleman concedes is improper construction and dangerous to human life, and that is what I want to avoid. The mere fact that he has half of the building destroyed or the roof destroyed is certainly an increased reason why that same improvement should not be permitted. It ought to be made better. The zoning commission should give its permission before any action is taken.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. If the restoration of the building is hazardous to human life, the present law protects. He has no right to construct something that is hazardous, but, on the other hand, the committee's thought in this matter was to preserve and protect the rights of individuals as far as consistent with the public interests, and I think the bill does that. If business has built up around this building with reference to the use of the building, with reference to the character of it, then it is no hardship on any abutting property owner that that use shall continue. When we strike out the words "wholly or," so that when a building is destroyed the owner can not rebuild, but allow him the right to repair when it is half destroyed, it seems to me we are doing justice to both the owner and the public.

Mr. GARD. There is hardly an instance where a building is wholly destroyed. Even the most inefficient fire department usually manages to save something, and you can hardly say that a building can be wholly destroyed before the zoning commission could have power in regard to its detail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TREADWAY). The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 22, noes 4.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not quite catch the number that was voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute motion was agreed to by a vote of 22 to 4. The question now recurs upon the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, in order to have the language uniform, I move that in line 7, page 5, after the word "such" the word "whole" be stricken out, and that the word "or" as it first appears on line 8 be stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, after the word "such," strike out the word "whole," and in line 8 strike out the first word "or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 28, noes 2.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAVIS. A large number of Members on the floor of the House did not vote on this amendment. Are those Members compelled to vote?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, Mr. Speaker, if politics are going to be brought in, to try to camouflage the situation, I make the point of order that there is no quorum, to show that not many more Members are on the floor than did vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, do not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. There are not many more Members on the floor than voted.

Mr. REAVIS. I make the point of order that a parliamentary inquiry is not debatable.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend by inserting a period after the word "Columbia," in line 14, page 5, striking out the rest of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, after the word "Columbia," strike out the semicolon and insert a period and strike out the words "or (d) prevent the restoration of a wall declared unsafe by the inspector of buildings of the District or by a board of survey appointed in accordance with any existing law or regulation."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that this bill is certainly not intended to carry out the purposes of the public utility in the shape of the language herein. Evidently very few people have read the bill, and very few are now giving it heed, and there are only a limited number who seem to be giving attention to the bill, even as it is read. [Applause.] I do not refer to that in any partisan sense or in any objectionable sense. The bill is not of general import, and Members generally are not interested in it, but this is a proposition of general interest. In this proviso (d) the bill says that nothing shall—prevent the restoration of a wall declared unsafe by the inspector of buildings of the District or by a board of survey appointed in accordance with any existing law or regulation.

In other words, if a wall is declared unsafe by the inspector of buildings, there is nothing to prevent its restoration, whatever that means. The language of the bill ought to be sufficiently broad to vest power and discretion in the zoning commission, because if a wall is unsafe it should not be restored, whatever that means; but if a wall is unsafe, the wall should be torn down, and if it is to be rebuilt there should be some authority conferred on the zoning commission to say where it should be rebuilt and of what material it should be rebuilt. There should be some regard for the public safety, because the bill is flaunting broadly in the mind of the public the fact that here in the District of Columbia if the inspector of buildings says that a wall is unsafe there is no power in the zoning commission to say that this wall shall not be restored. In other words, an unsafe wall shall be restored—unsafe in the first instance, to be restored to its original character of being unsafe. That surely is not what the gentleman means, and it seems to me that this language should be stricken out and a reasonable degree of discretion lodged in these zoning commissioners if this zoning law is to have any effect at all.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this law is patterned after the New York and St. Louis zone laws. They have been tested by the courts at different times and are considered by the experts as the most up-to-date and best laws in the United States on the subject. It is possible to rebuild or to reinforce a wall that may be unsafe to-day, and the zoning commission ought not to be given authority to compel the tearing down of the whole building in that sort of a case. It might be entirely unnecessary to do so, and it was the judgment of the committee that the zoning commission ought not to be given the authority to compel it.

Mr. GARD. The fault, I think, is that the bill pays too much attention to the builder and too little attention to the public. This is a public-benefit bill and not a bill for the benefit of the builders. Here in the District of Columbia, here in the Capital City of the Nation, a building zone law should be a model law and for the protection of the people, not of the persons who want to restore unsafe walls. This means exactly what it says, that if the wall has been declared unsafe under this law there is nothing to prevent that same wall from being restored in the same condition; in other words, it is unsafe now and restored to continue its unsafeness.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is taking away authority from the zone commission?

Mr. GARD. Yes; it is limiting the authority of the zone commission, but it is to prevent the faulty construction of buildings and the possible destruction of human life; that is what it does do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the condition all over the city.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 12, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any lawful use of a building or premises existing at the time of the adoption of orders and regulations made under the authority of this act may be continued, although such use does not conform with the provisions hereof or with the provisions of such orders and regulations; and such use may be extended throughout the building, provided no structural alteration, except those required by law or regulation, is made therein and no new building is erected. Where the boundary line of any use district divides a lot in a single ownership at the time of the adoption of orders and regulations under the authority of this act the commission may permit a use authorized on either portion of such lot to extend to the entire lot, but not more than 25 feet beyond the boundary line of the use district.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, to call the attention seriously of those Members who should be considering the bill to the fact. I have offered these suggestions merely for the betterment of the bill. I do not offer them in any other sense. I say that the bill as it is presently written and which we are now considering is so manifestly in the interest of the builder or the property owner and so entirely opposed to the public benefit that it should be most materially amended. I refer again not alone to the action of this committee, whether they understand what they are doing or not, saying unsafe walls may be put back exactly as they were in a building no matter what the public may think about it, but section 6 provides that no matter what the use of the building is at this time that use may be continued for all time without any regulatory action upon the part of the zoning commission even if the character of the neighborhood changed entirely. In other words, if a gasoline station is in a certain place and it becomes necessary to build a church in that particular location and the church is built, the fact that the gasoline station, or some highly hazardous place where the fire risk is great has been once maintained, is always to be maintained under this act, because there can be no interference with any vested rights. I am tired of hearing of vested rights. I am tired of hearing in these bills about the rights of the individual, and I think that something should be done for the rights of the public in whose proper interest these bills should be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful to use or permit the use of any building or premises or part thereof hereafter created, erected, changed, or converted wholly or partly in its use or structure until a certificate of occupancy shall have been issued by authority of said zoning commission.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. Does the bill clearly provide for a change of district by the zoning commission from time to time as the development in the city or the development in the District shall dictate?

Mr. MAPES. I think it does.

Mr. VENABLE. In glancing over the bill I received the impression that it was not very clear as to the authority of the zoning commission to change from time to time buildings in areas as the development and needs of the city should dictate. The chairman is of the opinion that that is taken care of?

Mr. MAPES. I think that is taken care of.

Mr. VENABLE. This proposes to confer that authority?

Mr. MAPES. That is the purpose.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Has this zoning commission approved of this bill? Does this commission that is to be established approve of this bill?

Mr. MAPES. The bill was introduced at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. They appeared before the committee in its behalf.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Has this bill been approved by the zoning commission of the city of Washington?

Mr. MAPES. It is approved by the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The original zoning commission?

Mr. MAPES. The three District Commissioners constitute over one-half of the membership of the zoning commission.

Mr. GALLAGHER. But they did not approve of this bill, did they?

Mr. MAPES. The commissioners did approve of it, and it was introduced at their request.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That buildings erected, altered, or raised, or converted in violation of any of the provisions of this act or the orders and regulations made under the authority thereof are hereby declared to be common nuisances; and the owner or person in charge of or maintaining any such buildings, upon conviction on information filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants in the name of said District, and which court is hereby authorized to hear and determine such cases, shall be adjudged guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100 per day for each and every day such nuisance shall be permitted to continue, and shall be required by said court to abate such nuisance. The corporation counsel of the District of Columbia may maintain an action in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the name of the District of Columbia to abate and perpetually enjoin such nuisance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee whether or not the word "raised," line 22, page 60, is correctly spelled? There are two words spelled differently. I rather suspect the word should be "razed."

Mr. MAPES. I think that correction should be made, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question, with the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly; I have finished.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then, for the purpose of making inquiry of the chairman of the committee, I ask to be recognized in my own right. I supposed when reading this section that it referred to a case where a building had been raised in height for the purpose of making its height conform to the street or some regulation of the authorities, or possibly for the purpose of convenience to the owner thereof. It looks to me as if this word was spelled as it should be. Very often parties want to make a change in the height of a building, sometimes by reason of a street regulation or sometimes for their own convenience, and sometimes they want to lift it from its present foundation, and it seems to me they ought not to be permitted to do that without the approval of the zoning commission.

Mr. MAPES. I can see no harm from having both words in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the word "elevated" were used there, the meaning would be clear. I think, as the gentleman states, if both words were used there would be no trouble about it.

Mr. MAPES. I move that the word "razed" be inserted after the word "altered" in line 22.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 6, line 22, after the word "altered" insert the word "razed."

Mr. GARD. The language as it is at present, I suspect, is intended to cover both definitions of the word—one definition meaning to elevate, the present spelling, and the other definition, "razed," to tear down.

I call attention to subsequent language in the bill, in lines 24 and 25, and especially in line 25. How are you going to accommodate that language with the words "common nuisances"? I think the intention of the framers of the bill is well carried out by the existing language. In other words, that the building is to be built up, put jacks under it and raise it, put a story on top of it, but by using the word "razed" you could not by any construction of law make "razing" a common nuisance.

And if you adhere to the language you have in line 25, then I think you should adhere to the language you have in line 22, because there could be no association of the word "razed" with a common nuisance, because if you tear a building down and demolish it there is not anything that would be a common nuisance. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] sees the point I am trying to get to the members of the committee, and sees by inference, I think, that I am right.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall enforce the provisions of this act and the orders and regulations adopted by said zoning commission under the authority thereof, and nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make municipal regulations as heretofore: Provided, That such regulations are not inconsistent with the provisions of this law and the orders and regulations made thereunder. In interpreting and applying the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder they shall be held to be the minimum requirements for the promotion of the public health, safety, comfort, convenience, and general welfare. This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties: Provided, however, That as to all future building construction or use of premises where this act or any orders or regulations adopted under the authority thereof impose a greater restriction upon the use of buildings or premises or upon height of building, or requires larger open spaces than are imposed or required by existing law, regulations, or permits, or by such easements, covenants, or agreements, the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder shall control.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GALLAGHER: At the end of section 10, page 8, line 11, add the following: "Provided further, That no buildings over four stories high shall be erected under this law without providing fire escapes thereon."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What is the point of order? This is a matter that is of vital importance to the people of this city. Nearly all of the four-story buildings here are erected without fire escapes, and I think one of the particular duties of Congress should be to provide fire escapes on all buildings that are at least four stories high. There ought to be some provision for tenants and people occupying four-story buildings, whereby they can escape in case a building catches on fire. I have noticed that all through this city there are three and four story buildings where there is no provision whatever for fire escapes, and in every civilized community they ought to provide fire escapes on four-story buildings. And that is the object of this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. If we are going to provide for four-story buildings, why should we not provide for three-story buildings? It is almost as dangerous to jump from a three-story building as from a four-story building.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They ought to be on three-story buildings as well. And I thought if I brought it to the attention of the committee that is considering this matter, they might see the propriety of doing this. That is the reason I offered the amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is no disputing what the gentleman from Illinois says. Buildings of four stories ought to be provided with fire escapes, and they no doubt are. That is undoubtedly a part of the building regulations of the District of Columbia. This bill is to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings, and to create a zoning commission. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not germane to this particular bill.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does not this bill apply to the use of buildings and to secure public safety?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman from Illinois is slightly in error. I lived for several years in a four-story apartment house that had fire escapes on it.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They would not tolerate a building law of this kind in Chicago without looking out for the safety of the public. I notice all over this city there are three and four story buildings that are without fire escapes. There is no provision of law that I know of requiring them to provide fire escapes, or they would be in sight, and I believe that as a matter of justice and decency we ought to provide this protection for the people who live in three and four story buildings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not prepared to dispute the assertion of the gentleman generally, but——

Mr. GALLAGHER. I am sure I am not making a misstatement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I must except this one building that I have referred to. It had four stories and fire escapes on it. I supposed they were put there in consequence of some city ordinance or regulation.

Mr. GALLAGHER. There ought to be regulations of that kind in this city, and I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted, so that fire escapes will be required by law.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] make the point of order?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman can point out to the Chair something in the amendment which applies to the provisions of the bill, the Chair would be glad. This bill simply provides for the height of buildings. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in section 10.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARD. I do this for the purpose of again calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to the seeming inconsistency of the language, as in other sections that I have called attention to. From what has been, I confess, but a cursory analysis of the bill as I have gone over it, it seems to me that the bill in one place writes in something to be done and then in another place, by an additional word or words, tries to nullify it, as I tried to make it appear was written in the proviso in section 5.

Now, in section 10 it provides "That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall enforce the provisions of this act and the orders and regulations adopted by said zoning commission under the authority thereof." It seems if we create the zoning commission, the zoning commission should have power to carry out its own provisions, and not one part of the zoning commission be permitted to enforce the provisions of the act, as this does.

Also I call attention to this statement, that, notwithstanding the commissioners shall enforce the provisions of the act, it provides that—

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make municipal regulations as heretofore.

In other words, notwithstanding what this act provides, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can go along and do just what they did before. Then they provide again—

Provided, That such regulations are not inconsistent with the provisions of this law and the orders and regulations made thereunder.

Now, what is the meaning of all this curious jumble of language?

Also, I call your attention to page 8, lines 1, 2, and 3—

This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties.

Then you say—

Provided, however, That as to all future building construction—

as it appears on line 3, if something greater is required by such easements, covenants, or agreements, the provisions of the act and the orders and regulations thereunder shall control. In other words, you say in two sentences that nothing shall abrogate or annul any easement, covenant, or other agreement between parties, and then you provide that if future building construction makes it any different, the easements, covenants, or agreements shall be null or abrogated. I call the attention of the Members of the House, and especially those who have had to do with the construction of the bill, to the fact that while I believe, as it is written, the bill has for its object what is no doubt a very excellent purpose, yet it is now but a curious jumble of words.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are glad to have the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] on the bill. He reads it with a peculiar attitude of mind, however, as it seems to me. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have charge of the enforcement of all the laws and regulations pertaining to the District of Columbia, and this bill does not propose to change their authority and their right in that respect. It leaves to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the authority to carry out this law and the regulations made by the zoning commission.

The gentleman from Ohio criticizes the following language in this bill:

This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties.

Of course, that means any existing agreements or covenants. It is not really necessary to put the word "existing" in. Anybody who understands the English language knows that it applies to them. The proviso is perfectly proper in going on and making provision that in the future agreements can not be made which are inconsistent with or limiting this act. It seems to me the language is perfectly clear and perfectly proper.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall enforce the provisions of this act and the orders and regulations adopted by said zoning commission under the authority thereof, and nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit the authority of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make municipal regulations as heretofore: Provided, That such regulations are not inconsistent with the provisions of this law and the orders and regulations made thereunder. In interpreting and applying the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder they shall be held to be the minimum requirements for the promotion of the public health, safety, comfort, convenience, and general welfare. This act shall not abrogate or annul any easements, covenants, or other agreements between parties: Provided, however, That as to all future building construction or use of premises where this act or any orders or regulations adopted under the authority thereof impose a greater restriction upon the use of buildings or premises or upon height of building, or requires larger open spaces than are imposed or required by existing law, regulations, or permits, or by such easements, covenants, or agreements, the provisions of this act and of the orders and regulations made thereunder shall control.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division on the vote.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 0.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. There were some slight amendments added from time to time. Were they included in the gentleman's motion?

The SPEAKER. They were passed by the House.

NORMAN LEE MOLZAHN.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 333, a bill providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place. That is on the Private Calendar. Is it necessary to ask unanimous consent to have it considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It can be considered in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINKAID. This bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and hence the chairman of that committee calls the bill up. Is it necessary, this being District day, to ask unanimous consent to take this bill up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. He does not ask unanimous consent to take it up. He asks unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 333) providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue a permit to A. J. Molzahn to disinter and remove the remains of his infant child, Norman Lee, who died of diphtheria, from its temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to such lot or place in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the father may choose for a permanent burial place, the body having been embalmed and contained in a copper-lined casket, but such permit shall not be issued unless there has been filed in the health department of the District of Columbia a permit from the proper governmental authorities at the place where the reinterment is to be made, authorizing said interment there of the said remains.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that he offer an amendment in line 6, page 1, where the name of the child is stated to be Norman Lee, by inserting the word "Molzahn," as that was the child's name.

Mr. MAPES. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GARD. I do not offer it, but simply suggest it to the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. I do not think it is necessary, but if the gentleman wants to offer it I have no objection.

Mr. GARD. I think it should be done, because the child's name was Norman Lee Molzahn.

Mr. MAPES. I ask unanimous consent that the name be inserted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "Lee," insert the word "Molzahn."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Would it be in order now to move that the same bill, which is on the Private Calendar, be stricken from that calendar, this bill having been passed?

The SPEAKER. That will be done automatically.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MINAHAN of New Jersey, for Tuesday, September 9, on account of important business.

To Mr. CRISP, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADMIRALS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred H. Res. 267, submit a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

House resolution 267.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7767, being a bill authorizing the President to appoint two admirals of the Navy; that there shall be one hour of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS] and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE]; that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendments, whereupon the bill shall be reported to the House with the amendments, if any; that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a rule which makes in order a bill that has for its purpose the recognition of the distinguished services of two of our great admirals of the Navy. Every American is proud of the Navy and of the work that it has done during the last two years. Probably that branch of our fighting machine was better prepared to do its work than any other, and as far as we are able to learn it did the work that it had to do in the most satisfactory and pleasing manner, and to-day is deserving of the generous approbation of the American people. I believe that it is especially fitting at this time that we should pass this bill and recognize these two admirals and thus show our appreciation of their services.

I am also informed by the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. PETERS] that it is necessary to have speedy action, because one of the gentlemen referred to will retire very soon on account of the age limit. I hope there will be no opposition to the rule or to the bill and each will receive the unanimous vote of the House.

As far as I know, there have been no requests for time on the rule from either side. Unless there are some requests, I will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 52, noes 1.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 56, noes 1.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. According to the provision of the rule, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7767, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 7767) to appoint Admiral William S. Benson, United States Navy, and Rear Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy, as permanent admirals in the Navy.

Mr. PETERS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

WILLIAM S. BENSON AND WILLIAM S. SIMS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the bill, with the assured action of the President to follow, is to give Admiral William S. Benson and Rear Admiral William S. Sims the permanent rank of admiral, which is now held by Benson temporarily as chief of operations, and which was held by Sims during the last part of his service in Europe.

It preserves their present relative seniority and makes them senior to other officers who are holding the rank of full admiral temporarily, like the commanders of the Atlantic and the Pacific Fleets, whose commissions might be prior in date.

It gives the new admirals full pay for life instead of three-quarters upon retirement, but as against that it provides that they may be called upon for any active duty even in peace time after retirement.

They are obliged to retire upon reaching the age limit as now provided by law instead of having the option themselves of retiring or not, as was the case when Dewey was made the Admiral of the Navy.

No new office is created in the sense that there will be any more officers in the Navy. These two men whose permanent rank is that of rear admiral, both of whom have held the rank of full admiral temporarily, will simply continue in the service until the retiring age as admirals instead of rear admirals. Upon their deaths the vacancies shall not be filled.

As to compensation, Congress in 1870 provided that the pay of a general in the Army should be $13,500. In 1908 it was provided that the pay of the corresponding rank in the Navy, being admiral, should be the same. It would seem rather niggardly of Congress in conferring the honor to cut down the pay, and so we have left it the same, although the pay of a temporary admiral is somewhat less. No allowances are provided for in addition to salary, and none would be drawn after retirement, which in the case of both these distinguished officers is regret-ably near in date, Admiral Benson retiring September 25, 1919, and Admiral Sims October 15, 1922.

Legislation concerning the grade of admiral in the Navy occurs in the last three war periods of our history.

CIVIL WAR LEGISLATION.

Prior to 1866 we had no grade of admiral. A rear admiral was the highest rank in the Navy. By the act of July 25, 1866, Congress provided—that the number allowed in each grade of line officers on the active list of the Navy shall be 1 admiral, 1 vice admiral, 10 rear admirals, 25 commodores, 50 captains—

And so forth.

In pursuance of this legislation Farragut was appointed admiral, and upon his death in 1870 Porter succeeded him. By the act of July 15, 1870, the salary was increased as follows:

That from and after the 30th day of June, 1870, the annual pay of the officers of the Navy on the active list shall be as follows: The admiral, $13,000.

In 1873 a law was passed abolishing the grades of admiral and vice admiral upon the first vacancies occurring.

That was the end of legislation affecting the office of admiral during that period.

SPANISH WAR LEGISLATION.

At the close of the Spanish War legislation was passed to give Dewey the highest possible place in the Navy. The act of March 2, 1899, provided:

That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by selection and promotion, an admiral of the Navy, who shall not be placed upon the retired list except upon his own application; and whenever such office shall be vacated by death or otherwise the office shall cease to exist.

Under this act, as was expected, the President appointed Dewey "the Admiral of the Navy" and he continued such till his death, when the office expired again.

During this period, as during the period succeeding the Civil War, it was the purpose of Congress to place one man at the head of the Navy. Dewey was not "an admiral." He was not "Admiral in the Navy." He was "the Admiral of the Navy." There could be no other.

PRESENT WAR LEGISLATION.

When it became necessary in 1915 and 1916 to make plans for the possible entry of the Navy into the war on a scale not previously dreamed of it was evident that a tremendous expansion of the Navy in men and ships and our probable association with the navies of the Allies would necessitate a certain enlargement of the personnel in the higher grades. It became imperative to carry nearer the top the pyramid of officers which was previously cut off several steps from the peak.

We first pushed the office of chief of naval operations into the place of first importance and made that officer the professional head of the Navy. This was in 1915. In 1916 we provided that—

Hereafter the chief of naval operations * * * shall have the rank and title of admiral, to take rank next after the Admiral of the Navy—

And so forth.

By act of May 22, 1917, it was provided—

That the President be * * * authorized to designate six officers of the Navy for the command of fleets or subdivisions thereof and, after being so designated, from the date of assuming such command until relinquishment thereof, not more than three of such officers shall each have the rank and pay of an admiral, and the others shall each have the rank and pay of a vice admiral, and the grades of admiral and vice admiral are hereby authorized and continued for the purposes of this act, * * * Provided, That when an officer with the rank of admiral or vice admiral is detached from the command of a fleet or subdivision thereof * * * he shall return to his regular rank in the list of officers of the Navy and shall thereafter receive only the pay and allowances of such rank.

In the act of July 1, 1918, was a clause to the effect that—officers of the Navy holding the rank and title of admiral and vice admiral in the Navy while holding such rank and title shall receive the allowances of a general and lieutenant general of the Army, respectively.

Under existing law we may have, and, as a matter of fact, now do have, four officers holding the rank and title of admiral—the chief of operations and the three officers in command each of a fleet, at present the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Asiatic Fleets.

With the passage of this bill we would have, during the lives of these distinguished officers, six admirals, four holding the rank temporarily and two during their lives, as a partial expression of the gratitude of the country for eminent and effective service rendered in the greatest war we ever undertook.

No longer may there be one man occupying a lonely pinnacle at the very top of the Navy, immune from involuntary retirement, but, for the present, six, each holding the rank but not the title of Dewey, four of them necessary to the business of our great Navy, and two of them honored for great accomplishment in the past.

There is good and sufficient reason for granting this honor to both these officers. It may be that others also should be recognized in some signal manner. Everybody knows the distinguished services rendered by Admiral Mayo in command of the Atlantic Fleet; by Admiral Wilson in France, where he represented the Navy and his country with unparalleled success; and by Admiral Rodman, in command of the battleships in the North Sea; by Admiral Gleaves, in command of the cruiser and transport force; and by Admiral Strauss, in command of the mine-laying force; but the President in his message has well said that Benson and Sims are the men upon "whom the principal responsibilities devolved for achieving the great results which our incomparable Navy accomplished," and when we honor them we recognize the whole Navy, which has come out of this war with the well-deserved reputation of having shown itself the most competent naval force in the world.

In selecting the two foremost men of all those responsible for the successful result of our naval operations and promoting each of them to the rank of full admiral, we offer a small return for the brilliant, patriotic, and effective service that has been rendered by each of them—a return less than has been given by Great Britain for distinguished service of the same kind—but a return customary, expected, and adequate considering the traditions and history of the Republic. The honor, unfortunately, can not be enjoyed by Admiral Benson to its full extent for more than a few days at most, as he retires this month by operation of law.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Would it interrupt the gentleman's remarks if I reverted to a statement earlier in his remarks in regard to the pay of the admirals?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly not.

Mr. TILSON. Two days ago we passed a resolution conferring the authority upon the President to appoint Gen. Pershing a general. Under the retirement laws he will retire with three-quarters pay, the same as other officers, whereas under the provisions of this resolution these two admirals will receive full pay during their lives.

Mr. PETERS. That statement is correct.

Mr. TILSON. Would the gentleman think it wise under these circumstances to make that discrimination?

Mr. PETERS. That is for the committee and the House to decide. But this should be said: While the bill authorizing the President to make Gen. Pershing a full general provides by implication that he retires on three-quarters pay when he reaches the retirement age, and this bill provides expressly that both officers shall receive full pay for life, in this bill the admirals are denied any allowances, while in the military bill Gen. Pershing would have the full allowances.

There is much reason, it seems to me, why both the admirals and the general should receive full pay for life. It is a small consideration considering the wonderful services they rendered. In Great Britain this compensation would be laughably small. They have made large grants to their officers in Great Britain who have performed no more difficult or heroic service than ours.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman know what the full pay of a general is?

Mr. PETERS. Thirteen thousand five hundred dollars—the same for a general and an admiral. It has been at this figure for some years, and besides we ought not to lose sight of the fact that the value of a dollar has greatly lessened. Also, it might interest the gentleman to know that at the present time there are negroes working in the Newport News shipyards on piece work who get approximately $10,000 a year. I believe that we ought to pay the admirals as much as we pay negroes in the shipyards. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman know what the allowances for a general are?

Mr. PETERS. I do not; perhaps the gentleman from Connecticut can give the details in regard to that.

Congress declared war in April, 1917, but the Navy declared war a long time before that. Admiral Benson became Chief of Naval Operations in May, 1915, under a mandate giving him the widest powers. In the language of the act of March 3, 1915, he was—charged with the operations of the fleet and with the preparation and readiness of plans for its use in war.

By the act of August 29, 1916, it was provided that—all orders issued by the Chief of Naval Operations in performing the duties assigned him shall be performed under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy and his orders shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary and shall have full force and effect as such.

As the professional head of the Navy from that time till now Admiral Benson had the responsibility of directing all strategic and tactical matters as well as the organization, maneuvers, drill, and training of the fleet. How well he carried out his mandate to get ready the fleet and make plans for war is shown by the fact that from the day the first armed guard limbered up its gun on the deck of a merchant ship to the surrender of the German Navy in Scapa Flow to the American and British fleets our Navy never "missed a trick." [Applause.]

His breadth of mind and soundness of judgment were manifested soon after we entered the war when the British and French sent naval representatives to Washington to inform us confidentially that the submarine situation was desperate and that they must have help. They asked for a few destroyers. Admiral Benson rose to the occasion. He sent every available vessel to Europe, the ultimate object being, not to keep our vessels safely in our own ports, but to win the war.

In October, 1917, Admiral Benson went to Europe for an important conference with the Allies and to bring about greater unity of action. His propositions were largely adopted by Admiral Jellicoe and his visit had the most important and far-reaching results. It was during this visit that it was agreed to send a division of American battleships to the grand fleet, and the plan of putting a barrage across the North Sea was decided upon. The actual completion of this barrage of mines wholly across the North Sea from Scotland to Norway, carried deep enough to prevent any submarine going through, was perhaps the greatest naval material activity of the whole war. It was the boldest, most hazardous, and best executed enterprise of the kind ever attempted—and it was successful. [Applause.]

In fact, wherever his duties called him, whether directing from headquarters in Washington, planning with the Allies in Europe, or supervising operations at the front, he got results.

The training and operating of the great force under his command was one of the prime factors in winning the war.

A mere statement of its size compared with the Civil War force and the Spanish War force shows the magnitude of the work.

Our total number of men in the Navy at the close of the Civil War was 51,500. The greatest number of ships was 1,176. Farragut, at New Orleans, had 47 ships and not over 20,000 men; at the Battle of Mobile Bay he had 18 ships and less than 5,000 men.

Our total personnel in the Spanish War, officers and men, was 24,000.

Our total ships were 196.

At the Battle of Manila Bay, which is reckoned a glorious day for the American Navy, Dewey had 2,500 men and 7 ships.

When this war practically closed in November, 1918, the naval forces carrying on the fight in various parts of the world under the general direction of Admiral Benson were 529,500 officers and men and 2,202 ships, with 629 more under construction.

Under the immediate command of Admiral Sims in European waters, included in the above figures, were 81,000 officers and men and 373 ships.

This great force of free-born Americans, voluntarily rushing to the defense of their country in its time of danger, constituting, with its fine professional nucleus, the American Navy, met every expectation, lived up to all traditions, justified our confidence, and in less than two years repaid us tenfold for every dollar we had spent upon it from the beginning of the Government. [Applause.]

The country expects and demands that we shall recognize this service in no ungenerous way.

We declared war in April, 1917. The Navy entered, to all intents and purposes, some months previously, but Admiral, then Lieutenant, Sims got in about 1901.

The Navy Department had been asleep for some years. Moreover, it was blind. Soggy with self-complacency as a result of our successful operations against poor old Spain, it was deaf to anything except praise. Sims was one of the few officers who had an acute idea of the relative value of our fleet. He had been observing and comparing. In November, 1901, ignoring official channels, where his revolutionary reports had been pigeonholed, he wrote directly to President Roosevelt, pointing out some dreadful defects in the fleet. Writing this letter meant a probable court-martial, but Sims never cared much for court-martial when he knew he was right. He grazed them pretty close several times in his career. This letter referred to various reports Sims had made, without apparent result, and gave as his judgment "that the protection and armament of even our most recent battleships are so glaringly inferior, in principle as well as in details, to those of our possible enemies, and that our marksmanship is so crushingly inferior to theirs, that one or more of our ships would, in their present condition, inevitably suffer humiliating defeat at the hands of equal numbers of our enemy's vessels of the same class and displacement."

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. A moment or two ago the gentleman referred to the allowances made by Great Britain to its generals and admirals. Can the gentleman state what they are?

Mr. BUTLER. Fifty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. PETERS. In some instances large grants of money were made to the British admirals in addition to salaries.

This letter that I refer to from Sims to Roosevelt started something. Principally it started Roosevelt. Through him Sims was placed in a position to make good. Largely as a result of his efforts, when we entered the war our gunners could shoot with deadly accuracy and our ships were the equal of any in the world.

Sims is a man of vision as well as of action. In 1910, after first-hand observations abroad, he submitted a report which declared that the European war could not be delayed longer than four years. He also said that England and France would be allies, and that Italy would subsequently join them. In his famous London speech he had previously predicted that the United States would be found fighting side by side with Great Britain.

Inevitably Sims was the man sent abroad March 28, 1917, to be on the spot and take charge in foreign waters when our naval forces should arrive to take their place in the greatest of all wars.

His appreciation of the military situation was quick and accurate. He reported that Great Britain and her allies were in a desperate situation and were being slowly but surely whipped. The submarine was winning the war for Germany. Great Britain was being strangled, and the blood-thirsty Hun would then turn his attention to us. A wise judgment as to the disposition of our forces at that moment was vital. Sims was responsible for the degree and character of our cooperation. A smaller man might have operated our forces as an independent unit. With rare judgment, he adopted a policy, which he steadfastly adhered to, of treating the United States forces as reserves being brought to the front. With extraordinary tact he brought about a most cordial and wonderfully effective cooperation between the British and American forces. Last year members of the Naval Affairs Committee were told by people in Queenstown that as soon as the American destroyers got down to work with the British vessels at that base the number of refugees previously brought in every day from torpedoed ships showed a marked decrease, and our destroyer commanders operating with the British told us that sometimes when the wonderful little vessels went out, as they did every day, regardless of weather, they were under a British and sometimes under an American flotilla commander, whichever happened to be senior. The British and American fighting men were working as one, and that combination could not be "licked."

Admiral Sims was put in command of our destroyer force April 28, 1917. On May 25 he was made vice admiral and ordered "commander United States naval forces operating in European waters."

On November 20, 1917, he was given additional duty as naval attaché, and on November 27, 1918, he was given the temporary rank of admiral. No short synopsis can give an adequate idea of the important and complicated duties assigned to and brilliantly performed by Admiral Sims. His record is well known. He made good in every position he occupied. He amply justified the confidence of his superiors. He interjected his force of character and judgment into a situation which was worse than critical and contributed impressively to the great result. While every naval officer did his duty, Sims was preeminently the right man in the right place. His achievements inspire the respect, admiration, and gratitude of his countrymen.

The Navy has never failed the American people, and the American people rejoice in the opportunity to make some small return for brilliant service modestly performed. [Applause.]

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I would not undertake to address the House on this subject at all were it not for the fact that I, with every other American citizen who knows the history of the American Navy, must have unbounded pride therein. When I think of a David Paul Jones, when I know of a Perry, when I remember the deeds of a Farragut, and of a Dewey in Manila Bay, and then couple them with the heroic and patriotic services of Benson and Sims I think I would be lax in my duty if I were not to utter some words from Pennsylvania favoring the passage of this measure. There are no more glorious pages in the history of the American Government than those that inscribe the deeds of our heroic sailors. Their duty in the first place is perhaps more perilous than even that of the soldier, but, be that as it may, there never has been an occasion in all the long history of the country when the sailor boy has not met the full measure of his duty. I know that we are proud of our Army, and I am confident that every American citizen is equally proud of the Navy, and when you take into comparison the deeds performed by the American sailor boys and their commanders in this war we need not be ashamed of that record as compared with the record of the great British Navy. For years past—yes, almost for a generation, and perhaps before that time—Great Britain, the British Empire, has been styled the mistress of the seas. The American people, however, have had no ambition in that direction, no ambition to control the highways of the ocean, but the American people have always had the desire to retain unblemished and unsullied the record of the past, and that record, commencing in the days of 1812, and even before that time, remained unblemished and unsullied during all the period of the Civil War, and then the Spanish War, and now again remains untarnished through the record of this great struggle that we have just finished, and it seems to me all this is worthy of commemoration by the passage of this measure.

You have had called to your attention the fact that Great Britain and the English Government have rewarded their admirals. I saw in the newspapers the other day that Mr. Lloyd-George had said that the debt of Great Britain now was $200,000,000,000—at least that the war had cost the British Empire $200,000,000,000. We know that the war has cost us in round numbers perhaps $21,000,000,000. If we, having only one-tenth of the expense that Great Britain has had in financing this war, are we not able to afford the paltry sum of $13,500 a year for life to these gentlemen, then it seems to me we will be very lax in our idea of the patriotism and honorable service that these gentlemen have rendered. [Applause.]

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, what we do here, let us do at once, and willingly and cheerfully. I would not withhold this great distinction from these gentlemen for one minute if it were not that I desire to add a word of commendation to their enviable records. I have been associated with them 25 years in this great effort which has been completed successfully. This common cause in which I have taken an interested but unimportant part—a preparation for the great day—moves me to say just a word. I have known these two men of the deep sea many years—Sims and Benson. Both of them taught the Navy to float, and one of them taught the Navy to shoot, and both of them led when the Hun cast his shadow before us. My friends, there never has been a time in the consideration of any measure of importance, whether affecting either men or things, but which concerned the Navy when both were not called for their counsel, and there never has been a time when that counsel was not accepted, because those who listened felt that they heard the words of great leaders devoted to a Nation's cause; our confidence in them was not misplaced nor our confidence in their great ability misjudged. When our fleets took to the sea we knew who would command; so did every man in the Navy know. You men who know me know that I am not a fresh-water sailor; that I am not in favor of hanging decorations on men unless those decorations are earned. Benson organized and directed the operation of this fleet, and for years has been instrumental in its construction. Benson pointed the way; Sims followed it to a conclusion. Gentlemen will recall this. These two men, one at the head of the force and the other upon the high seas all the time, carried all of these troops abroad without the loss of a man, caught the submarine, and compelled our enemies to ask for terms.

Under the direction of Sims our naval forces laid a barrage across the North Sea that cost this Government $46,000,000, and in which the Germans themselves admit that seven of their submarines were caught. If the Germans had been able to sink the commerce, our cause would have failed. Benson and Sims, with the aid of the service they had prepared, stood in the way.

These men are not the only men who deserve great distinction; but, my friends, let us do what we propose to do spontaneously and with a generosity that starts in the heart, and do it unanimously and graciously, and hand to these old dogs of the sea this recognition of merit. It belongs to them and to the whole Navy because of service well done.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] says it is only a pittance. He speaks sensibly. In a few days one of these men retires and the other will be on the active list only three years longer and then the grade dies. The Navy asks this to be done. The men of the service have picked these men for this honor, and the country will be gratified if you are satisfied to so distinguish them. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes additional to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the achievements of the Navy in the Great War were unique and incomparable in our history. They form a brilliant record of accomplishment; of cooperation and coordination; of judgment and foresight; of determination and courage, unsurpassed in the annals of the sea.

The scope of action was without precedent—the performance without parallel. When before has any Navy been confronted with such gigantic tasks as those which confronted our Navy in the spring of 1917? And when in all history have problems only approaching them, been solved with such complete success? The magnitude of the numbers to be transported across the danger-infested ocean presented a situation unknown in any war, ancient or modern—a problem so difficult that the German high command considered it utterly impossible, and yet the American Navy, bidding defiance to its enemies, accomplished the impossible. One million men sent across in American ships, with 4,000,000–6,000,000 more to follow if the call had come. How many were lost? Of all that mighty host who sailed under the American flag, not a man—to the everlasting glory of the Navy—not a man was lost. [Applause.]

Think of the strategy necessary to surmount the dangers encountered. And what were those perils? To the ordinary hazards of the sea were added in an hundredfold the danger of hidden mines, of lurking submarines, of risk of collision from convoy formation when our ships, without lights or beacons, braved the darkness and the dangers of the storm-swept Atlantic.

Recall the vastness of the field of operation. Where is there a page of history that tells of any nation defending 3,000 miles of coast line, protecting its vast commerce, transporting its armies to a foreign soil, and waging a victorious war thousands of miles across the seas? This was the call for genius as well as for daring, for plodding service as well as for unflinching courage, for organization as well as for sacrifice.

And how did the Navy respond in the hour of need?

At home, by building new ships, not by the score but by hundreds; reconstructing German liners left broken wrecks; procuring supplies in unheard-of quantities; producing munitions—enough to shatter the loftiest mountains; patrolling our harbors and ports and sweeping our coasts. That record will endure forever.

On the seas, by manning the merchant ships; hunting submarines; locating mines; convoying the fleets of cargo vessels on whose safety depended the lives not only of our own soldiers but those of our allies as well; and conveying our troops to the war zone. What more perilous service has ever come to mariners since first a boat was launched upon the deep? Did a single man falter before dangers that appalled the stoutest hearts? No, not one! [Applause.]

On foreign soil, by cooperating with the British fleet in perfect harmony, united with them in strength as well as in purpose; constructing across the tempestuous North Sea in waters 350 to 1,050 feet in depth the greatest mine barrage ever conceived, considered by many too chimerical to be within the range of possibility; laying a pipe line across Scotland, 137 miles in length; erecting 33 air stations and equipping them with barracks and shops; furnishing the Army the heaviest mobile guns on the line; building hospitals and docks; constructing storehouses; perfecting systems to detect submarines and devising methods to overcome them. But, above all, bringing to our struggling allies the hope and confidence inspired by the moral as well as the physical force of a nation that marshaled its full power of blood and treasure and sacrifice for the single purpose of victory. [Applause.]

These were the deeds of the Navy to be passed down, unstained heritages for those who come after. Where in all the conflicts of the human race—where is there a record that will compare with this?

To the constructive endeavor, the constancy of purpose, the fertility of resource, and the heroic bravery of officers and men of the service, no higher tribute can be paid than by the simple words, "All was well with the Navy."

For those whom this bill seeks to honor, little need be said. They were potent factors in the onward sweep to victory. Their names are known and honored by their fellow countrymen. Both are men of noblest character, both are officers of brilliant attainments, each deserving of the highest honors and the unstinted praise of a grateful country. Their work is done. Their services were rendered, not in the roar of guns or the shriek of shells, not in the spectacular setting of broken masts or sinking ships, but in that earnestness of willing cooperation, tireless effort, skillful management, and steadfast determination, which achieved a triumph, absolute and complete.

The Navy honors itself and the Nation it serves when it adds to the brilliant galaxy of admirals—Jones and Farragut, Porter and Dewey—the names of Benson and of Sims. [Applause.]

MEMORANDUM OF LAWS CONCERNING THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY, THE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS, AND FLEET AND VICE ADMIRALS.

By special act approved March 2, 1899, the President was authorized to appoint, by selection and promotion, an Admiral of the Navy, who was not to be retired except upon his own application. The naval act approved March 3, 1899, provided that the pay and allowances of the Admiral of the Navy should be the same as those received by the last General of the Army. George Dewey was commissioned as Admiral of the Navy on March 2, 1899, and the office ceased to exist on the date of his death, January 16, 1917.

The naval appropriation act approved May 13, 1908, established the following rates of pay for officers of the Navy, viz:

Admiral	$13,500
Rear admiral, first nine	8,000
Rear admiral, second nine, or commodore	6,000
Captain	4,000
Commander	3,500
Lieutenant commander	3,000
Lieutenant	2,400
Lieutenant (junior grade)	2,000
Ensign	1,700

In addition to their pay, officers are allowed by law, where public quarters are not provided, commutation of quarters, heat, and light; and while at sea or on foreign shore duty they receive, in lieu of said allowances, 10 per cent additional of their base pay plus longevity pay, the law providing that there shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer below the rank of rear admiral 10 per cent of his current yearly pay for each term of five years' service, putting a limitation, however, on the increase which might be derived from this source. From July 1, 1918, to October 1, 1919, officers on sea duty having dependents are entitled to quarters for their dependents, or commutation therefor.

The naval act approved March 3, 1915, provided that—

There shall be a Chief of Naval Operations, who shall be an officer on the active list of the Navy appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the officers of the line of the Navy not below the grade of captain, for a period of four years, who shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, be charged with the operations of the fleet and with the preparation and readiness of plans for its use in war: Provided, That if an officer of the grade of captain be appointed Chief of Naval Operations, he shall have the rank, title, and emoluments of a rear admiral while holding that position.

During the temporary absence of the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy the Chief of Naval Operations shall be next in succession to act as Secretary of the Navy.

This act also created the positions of three fleet admirals and three fleet vice admirals, naming the fleets specifically, and providing that the pay of a fleet admiral should be $10,000 per annum and of a fleet vice admiral $9,000 per annum. As by this provision the fleet admirals and fleet vice admirals ranked the Chief of Naval Operations, who the law charged with the operations of the fleets and with the preparation and readiness of plans for its use in war, the following remedial provision was carried in the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, viz:

Hereafter the Chief of Naval Operations, while so serving as such Chief of Naval Operations, shall have the rank and title of admiral, to take rank next after the Admiral of the Navy, and shall, while so serving as Chief of Naval Operations receive the pay of $10,000 per annum and no allowances. All orders issued by the Chief of Naval Operations in performing the duties assigned him shall be performed under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and his orders shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary of the Navy, and shall have full force and effect as such. To assist the Chief of Naval Operations in performing the duties of his office there shall be assigned for this exclusive duty not less than 15 officers of and above the rank of lieutenant commander of the Navy or major of the Marine Corps: Provided, That if an officer of the grade of captain be appointed Chief of Naval Operations he shall have the rank and title of admiral, as above provided, while holding that position: Provided further, That should an officer, while serving as Chief of Naval Operations, be retired from active service he shall be retired with the lineal rank and the retired pay to which he would be entitled had he not been serving as Chief of Naval Operations.

The special act of May 22, 1917, in effect repealed that portion of the act of March 3, 1915, which related to the designation of specific fleets to which fleet admirals and fleet vice admirals were to be assigned, and provided—

That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to designate six officers of the Navy for the command of fleets or subdivisions thereof and, after being so designated from the date of assuming command until relinquishing thereof, not more than three of such officers shall each have the rank and pay of an admiral, and the others shall each have the rank and pay of a vice admiral. * * *.

The Naval appropriation act approved July 1, 1918, provided—

That hereafter the Chief of Naval Operations shall receive the allowances which are now or may hereafter be prescribed by or in pursuance of law for the grade of general in the Army, and the officers of the Navy holding the rank and title of admiral and vice admiral in the Navy while holding such rank and title shall receive the allowances of a general and lieutenant general of the Army, respectively. * * *.

The following are the names of the men who filled the positions of admiral and vice admiral at different times during the war period:

Admiral: A. M. Knight, F. F. Fletcher, W. B. Caperton, H. T. Mayo, Wm. L. Rodgers, Wm. S. Sims, H. B. Wilson, and Hugh Rodman.

Vice admiral: Dewitt Coffman, Albert Gleaves, A. W. Grant, W. S. Sims, C. S. Williams, H. B. Wilson, and H. P. Jones.

The following are the names of the men now filling the positions of admiral and vice admiral:

Admiral: H. B. Wilson (commanding Atlantic Fleet), Hugh Rodman (commanding Pacific Fleet), and Albert Gleaves (commanding Asiatic Fleet).

Vice admiral: H. P. Jones (Atlantic Fleet), C. S. Williams (Pacific Fleet), and Wm. L. Rodgers (Asiatic Fleet).

MEMORANDUM OF LAWS RELATING TO THE NUMBER OF OFFICERS OF THE LINE AND VARIOUS STAFF CORPS OF THE NAVY.

Excerpts from naval act approved August 29, 1916:

Hereafter the total number of commissioned officers of the active list of the line of the Navy, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, shall be 4 per cent of the total authorized enlisted strength of the active list, exclusive of the Hospital Corps, prisoners undergoing sentence of discharge, enlisted men detailed for duty with the Naval Militia, and the Flying Corps: Provided, That the total number of commissioned line officers on the active list at any one time, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, shall be distributed in the proportion of 1 of the grade of rear admiral to 4 in the grade of captain, to 7 in the grade of commander to 14 in the grade of lieutenant commander, to 32½ in the grade of lieutenant to 41½ in the grades of lieutenant (junior grade) and ensign, inclusive.

The total authorized number of commissioned officers of the active list of the following staff corps, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, shall be based on percentages of the total number of commissioned officers of the active list of the line of the Navy, as follows:

Pay corps, 12 per cent; Construction Corps, 5 per cent; Corps of Civil Engineers, 2 per cent; and that the total authorized number of commissioned officers of the Medical Corps shall be sixty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total authorized number of the officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, including midshipmen, Hospital Corps, prisoners undergoing sentence of discharge, enlisted men detailed for duty with the Naval Militia, and the Flying Corps.

On and after June 30, 1920, no captain, commander, or lieutenant commander shall be promoted unless he has had not less than two years' actual sea service on seagoing ships in the grade in which serving or who is more than 56, 50, or 45 years of age, respectively: * * * Provided further, That captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders who become ineligible for promotion on account of age shall be retired on a percentage of pay equal to 2½ per cent of their shore-duty pay for each year of service: Provided further, That the total retired pay shall not exceed 75 per cent of the shore-duty pay they were entitled to receive while on the active list.

OFFICE OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,

For: Congressman HICKS.
Subject: Shore activities in Europe during the war.

The activities of the Navy on shore in Europe during the war consists principally of the following:

Construction of mine bases at Invergordon, Inverness, Scotland, and Bizerta, Tunis. At the time of the armistice there was a total of 60 officers and 2,222 men at these bases.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE NORTH SEA BARRAGE.

From the time of the entrance of the United States into the war it was the opinion in the Navy Bureau of Ordnance that the most effective way of combating the submarine would be to establish an antisubmarine barrier across the North Sea, which would prevent the submarine from reaching the Atlantic. The bureau made an intensive study of various types of barrage, including nets, nets with mines, and mines alone. It soon became apparent that only the mine was practicable, and no mine then in existence was entirely satisfactory for the purpose. The distance across the North Sea was 250 miles and the depth of water was very great, in some places reaching a depth of 1,100 feet. Mining in such depths of water had never before been carried out, and the length of the barrage also offered great difficulties. In fact, the British admiralty believed that such a project was altogether impracticable.

A new type of mine was developed by the Bureau of Ordnance during the summer of 1917, which was especially adapted for use against submarines, since it would be exploded by the close approach of a vessel, as well as by the actual contact of a ship with the mine case. This feature of the mine gave it a larger effective radius and so reduced by about two-thirds the number of mines necessary for a given area.

After the development of this mine had progressed sufficiently to give assurance of its success, the Navy Department submitted plans for a North Sea barrage to the British admiralty, which were accepted by them in modified form. According to the plan finally agreed upon certain portions of the mine field were to be mined by the United States with United States mines and certain other areas were to be mined by the British with British mines.

The North Sea barrage project was formally approved by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain the latter part of October, 1917. The Bureau of Ordnance was directed to proceed with the procurement of the necessary material for 100,000 mines, the number it was estimated would be required.

To secure the required high rate of production of mines that was necessary, and also to preserve the secrecy of the new mine, the work of manufacture was divided among a large number of contractors—140 principal contractors and over 400 subcontractors. Partial assembly of parts into groups took place in this country at plants of principal contractors and at the points selected for shipment of mine material overseas, and complete assembly was made at the advanced bases in Scotland. The total cost of the 100,000 mines amounted to $25,150,000.

The majority of the mines were loaded with T. N. T.—300 pounds to each mine—at the mine-loading plant, St. Juliens Creek, Va. This plant, consisting of 22 buildings, was constructed during the winter of 1917–18 and was designed to be capable of receiving, loading, and shipping 1,000 mines a day of 24 hours. When necessary, however, more than this number could be taken care of, the number on one occasion reaching a total of 1,530, an average of better than one mine a minute in the 24-hour period. A total of 73,000 mines, involving the melting and handling of 22,000,000 pounds of T. N. T., were loaded at the mine plant, and, in addition, about 17,000 mines were loaded by contract with a large explosive company near the place of manufacture of the mine case.

The mine carriers were 23 cargo vessels, each of about 3,000 tons capacity, which were allocated to the Navy Department for exclusive mine-carrying use. As many as four carriers were loaded at one time, and the record time for completely loading a vessels was 22 hours.

Two advanced mine bases for the inspection and assembly of mines were established on the eastern coast of Scotland, one at Invergordon and the other at Inverness. The first mine carriers bringing mine material arrived in April, 1918, and assembly began soon after. The work of assembling the mines was a highly organized process, developed in accordance with the present standards of manufacturing efficiency. It had been estimated originally that the two bases could assemble and inspect 500 mines a day, but this number was greatly exceeded and the highest number assembled in a day was 1,340.

Before the North Sea barrage project was decided on the mine force of the United States Navy included two mine layers. When it became necessary to enlarge the force for the planting of the barrage eight merchant ships were taken over and converted into mine layers, making a total of 10.

The mine squadron sailed in May, 1918, and the first American mine-laying operation in the North Sea took place on June 8. There were in all 13 such excursions of the United States mine squadron in the laying of the North Sea barrage, the last operation being completed on October 26, 1918. The maximum number of mines laid on any one excursion was 5,520, requiring less than four hours altogether. Though the barrage was composed of both British and American mines and was established jointly by mine layers of both Navies, 56,611 mines, or 80 per cent of the 70,263 mines planted in the barrage, were American mines and were laid by the American mine squadron.

The barrage when completed extended from Norwegian territorial waters to within 10 miles of the Orkney Islands, the 10-mile passage being heavily patrolled. When submarines began to use Norwegian territorial waters to reach the open sea, the Norwegian Government announced its decision to mine Norwegian waters, and this had the effect of closing that gap.

The exact number of submarines destroyed by the barrage will never be known, but it appears from information obtained from German sources that 23 were so lost. The main purpose and result of the barrage, however, was to prevent the U-boats from attempting to reach the Atlantic, and by doing this it caused the failure of the submarine warfare. Without doubt the North Sea barrage had a very considerable part in ending the war, and it may rightly be considered one of the most important naval operations undertaken by the United States.

Aviation construction work involved in establishment of 33 stations, at a total cost of over $11,000,000, including the following facilities: Seaplane, dirigible, and kite balloon hangars; runways; piers; platforms; barracks; mess halls; galleys; storehouses; hospitals; repair shops; garages; power houses; recreation buildings; administration buildings; roads; water tanks; gasoline tanks; telephone and water lines.

These 33 stations covered 2,620 acres. The cubic contents of all buildings was over 110,000,000 cubic feet, or fifteen times the volume of the Woolworth Building. The barracks totaled 1,325,000 square feet. The water-front improvements involved 60,000 square feet of piers and 180,000 cubic yards of dredging. Five hundred and twenty-three miles of telephone lines were constructed, 232,000 square feet of hospitals, and a total tank storage capacity for water of 2,700,000 gallons and for gasoline of 348,000 gallons. Twenty-five radio stations were built, storehouses totaling 782,000 square feet, and hangars totaling 2,765,000 square feet.

A Navy radio station was built at Bordeaux under the supervision of the Navy. This included the construction of 8 steel towers, each 820 feet high.

Fuel-oil stations were constructed at Brest, Fort La Pallice, and L'Oriente.

A fuel-oil pipe line across Scotland was authorized by the Secretary of the Navy April 1, 1918, with the idea of securing a continuous and adequate supply of fuel oil in the North Sea for the British Navy, with a minimum risk of interference from enemy submarines.

This line is 137 miles long and constructed of 8-inch pipe. It follows the course of the Clyde and Forth Canal, the starting point being at Old Kilpatrick, on the outskirts of Glasgow, and the terminal at Grangemouth. Construction was started June 1, 1918, and completed October 30, 1918. The line was constructed under the supervision of an American naval unit.

[Memorandum for Mr. HICKS, Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.]

The following data is submitted in compliance with request transmitted. It is, at best, very incomplete, as returns and reports covering activities and expenditures have not yet been received in many cases. Expenditures from the $1,000,000 appropriation for "Overseas hospital construction" were made as required by Admiral Sims, and will, of course, be duly accounted for. Whenever possible buildings for hospital and dispensary use were obtained by donation, the only expenses being those of remodeling and upkeep. At other places buildings were leased, and at others we made use of portable buildings, mostly shipped from the United States. In some cases, as, for instance, at Queenstown, Ireland, by turning the buildings over to an allied government at cost, the expenditure will be largely reduced.

TRANSPORT SERVICE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
Washington, September 3, 1919.

Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HICKS: In compliance with your request in regard to the operation of transports, I submit this information in regard to their operation.

At the beginning of the war the transports were operated by the War Department, with the Navy Department in charge of placing vessels in convoy, and responsible for the security and defense of these vessels at sea. A naval officer was placed on board each vessel for this purpose. It was found that through lack of discipline of the merchant crews that the safety of these transports was endangered while passing through submarine-infested waters. It was, therefore, decided that the Navy would man all troop transports carrying troops through the war zone.

The Navy was then charged with manning, operating, and escorting these vessels, and the regulation of the interior discipline. The Navy moved the ships to the ports designated by the Army. The Army had charge of the loading of the vessels, assignment of transportation, and controlled the docks at which the vessels were berthed.

Very truly, yours,

W. S. BENSON,
Admiral, United States Navy, Chief of Naval Operations.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., September 4, 1919.

Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HICKS: In response to your inquiry, the following information is submitted in connection with the operation of troop transports and cargo vessels by the Navy for the account of the War Department.

On June 1, 1919, there were 111 commercial vessels with a troop-carrying capacity of 326,041 men operated by the Navy for Army account as troop transports. On these vessels all expenditures (except charter hire) are paid by the Navy, and reimbursement is requested from the War Department, except for the pay, allowances, and subsistence of the Navy personnel on board.

Charter hire on these vessels is not paid by the Navy, this being left for adjustment between the War Department and the Shipping Board.

In addition to the above-mentioned commercial vessels, 19 battleships and cruisers with a troop-carrying capacity of 24,914 men have been engaged in bringing troops home. On these vessels all expenses are borne by the Navy except the subsistence of Army officers and troops and the cost of installing and removing standees and special fittings required for transporting troops. The cost of the standees and special fittings installed on these vessels is also charged to the War Department, and after its removal the material is turned over to that department. No charge is made for charter hire on these vessels, the only expense to the War Department being the cost of subsistence of Army personnel and of special fittings, as stated above.

Besides troop transports there have been 239 cargo ships, 3 colliers, 2 tankers, and 11 refrigerator ships operated by the Navy for Army account. These were all commercial vessels and have been operated along the same lines as the troop transports, i. e., all expenses (except charter hire) are paid by the Navy, and the Army is billed for the total cost, after deducting the pay, allowances, and subsistence of the Navy personnel on board.

Sincerely, yours,

C. J. PEOPLES,
Acting Paymaster General of the Navy.

"No American troop transport was lost on its eastward voyage. For this splendid record the Navy, which armed, manned, and convoyed the troop transports, deserves the highest commendation."

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I join most heartily with everything that has been said in commendation of our Navy and what it has done in this war. It has shown itself worthy of its high traditions in the past, and nothing higher than that can really be said with reference to it. So far as the individual operations proper are concerned they seem to have been beyond all criticism, but there is one matter in connection with the management of our Navy personnel that I wish to call to the attention of the House at this time.

Everyone knows that a large number of our young men enlisted in the Navy for the duration of the war. All the Members of this House know that although the war has to all intents and purposes ceased, it is nearly impossible to get a young man out of the Navy, no matter how important his needs or necessity.

I wish at this time, in the few minutes that are allotted to me, to call attention of Members to one instance which is a fair example of the situation prevailing in the Navy. It has a hospital for tuberculosis patients at Fort Lyon, Colo., an important hospital, and nominally there are some 600 patients in attendance at that hospital. As a matter of fact a large number of these patients are out on leave, a large number awaiting discharge, and a large number convalescent, so that they are able to do work on the hospital grounds. There are actually 114 bed patients at that hospital, men who are in need of constant attention. The number of men being kept there to attend these 114 is 99, and as I understand and am informed they need only about 40 to attend to these patients. A number of those who are kept there as a part of the Navy to attend these patients in the capacity of hospital attendants are young men who wish to go on with their schooling, young men who have important matters that are suffering by reason of their detention, young men who will in many instances lose a whole year out of their career so far as their life work is concerned if they are detained there into the next winter.

Now, the Navy Department has issued an order forbidding the discharge of any more of those men.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes, if I have the time.

Mr. RAKER. I was down at the Navy Department this morning, and is it not a fact that they are trying to get the boys out of the service so fast from the various hospitals that they are really endangering the lives and health of those that are in there? The Navy Department is advising the public that that is the fact, that they have not the men there to take care of them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have just pointed out that they have at that hospital more than twice the number that there is any necessity for at this time, and I feel sure that there can not be any valid claim that so many men are needed there. The reason why they are detained is simply because the Navy Department has issued a sweeping order that no more of these men can be discharged. There is no necessity in any event for keeping those men there. One reason why they are there is because the Navy Department insists on running merchant vessels with the naval organization, when the work is done by them better, cheaper, and more expeditiously and far more satisfactorily than by the ordinary merchant personnel. Another is that the new recruits are not assigned to such places.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BROWNING. Did the gentleman say that there has been a sweeping order issued by the Navy Department that no more of these men should be discharged?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. At that particular hospital at least.

Mr. BROWNING. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, that is my information.

Mr. BROWNING. I never heard of it at all, and I know very recently a young man I interceded for got out of there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would say that my information is a letter I received from the commandant of the hospital this very day. Does not the gentleman think that is proper authority?

Mr. BROWNING. I never heard of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, there have been several references made on the floor of the House about the position of the American Legion toward the soldier's settlement bill (H. R. 487). As long as a letter from another representative organization has been read before the House, I would ask the Clerk to read this letter in the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
New York City, September 5, 1919.

The honorable Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: The attention of the joint national executive committee of the American Legion has been called to misrepresentations made to Congress with respect to the legion's attitude toward the soldiers' settlement bill, H. R. 487. The committee particularly refers to a letter inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 2, 1919, appearing on page 4624 thereof. In order that Members of Congress may be correctly advised as to the attitude of the American Legion toward H. R. 487, the soldiers' settlement bill, the following is respectfully submitted by the national executive committee of the American Legion:

The American Legion has never gone on record in favor of H. R. 487 or any other specific land legislation now before Congress. The following resolution was adopted at the St. Louis caucus of the American Legion held May 8, 1919, on this particular subject:

"Whereas the reclamation of arid, swamp, or cut-over timberlands is one of the great constructive problems of immediate interest to the Nation; and

"Whereas one of the questions for immediate consideration is that of presenting to discharged soldiers and sailors an opportunity to establish homes and create for themselves a place in the field of constructive effort; and

"Whereas one of the purposes for which the formation of the American Legion is contemplated is to take an energetic interest in all constructive measures designed to promote the happiness and contentment of the people, and to actively encourage all proper movements of a general nature to assist the men of the Army and Navy in solving the problems of wholesome existence; and

"Whereas the Department of the Interior and the Reclamation Service have been engaged in formulating and presenting to the country broad, constructive plans for the reclamation of arid, swamp, or cut-over timberlands: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the caucus of delegates to the American Legion in convention assembled in the city of St. Louis, Mo., That we indorse the efforts heretofore made for the reclamation of lands, and respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States the adoption at an early date of broad and comprehensive legislation for economic reclamation of all lands susceptible of reclamation and production."

Preliminary to carrying out this resolution, the joint national executive committee of the American Legion, at its headquarters, No. 19 West Forty-fourth Street, New York City, on July 8, 1919, adopted a resolution authorizing the chairman to immediately appoint three members of the legion to devote the necessary time to a thorough study of the subject and to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in effectuating the resolution of the St. Louis caucus indorsing the principle of land development.

The above action was taken after a representative of the Secretary of the Interior had appeared before the national executive committee of the American Legion in order to explain the provisions of the soldiers' settlement bill. The Secretary of the Interior had requested this privilege and the courtesy was, therefore, extended to his representative. It was definitely decided, however, that pending the results of the study to be made of the committee of three, appointed to consider the subject of land legislation, the American Legion would take no action on the Mondell bill or any other specific legislation of this kind. It is the intention now, however, to take no action on this subject until the First Annual Convention of the American Legion, which is to be held in Minneapolis on November 11, 1919.

It is not the policy of the American Legion to attack or oppose other veteran societies; therefore the insinuations cast against the American Legion in the letter which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are not discussed as they have no bearing on the subject matter of this letter.

Very respectfully,

HENRY D. LINDSLEY,
Chairman National Executive Committee.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint Admiral William S. Benson, United States Navy, and Rear Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy, permanent admirals, and they shall retain their present seniority as between themselves and shall be senior to officers temporarily appointed to the grade of admiral: Provided, That said permanent admirals shall not suffer any reduction in pay when retired for age, pursuant to the provisions of the existing law, and the President is authorized, in his discretion, upon or after retirement, to assign them to active duty: Provided further, That the pay of said permanent admirals shall be that prescribed in the act making appropriations for the naval service and for other purposes, approved May 13, 1908: And provided further, That whenever the appointments made pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be vacated by death or otherwise the resulting vacancies shall not be filled: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall create any vacancy in any grade in the Navy or increase the total number of officers authorized by law.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose to detract one word from what has been said in honor of Admiral Sims and Admiral Benson. I wish that we might honor all of those who are so well entitled to honor by reason of their heroic deeds and the part that they have respectively played during this war. I do think, however, that while we are paying honor to these men in high places we should take a little bit of time to discharge a duty which we owe to the private. I wish again to call the attention of this House to a condition which should not be and which I think is a blot on the fair escutcheon we have been extolling so highly here to-day. I refer again to the sending of the Fifth and Fiftieth Regiments to Europe. It was stated the other day, in answer to a remark that I had made, that these were new men being sent over there for the purpose of taking the place of old men who have been there for a number of months so as to permit them to come home. That is not correct. More than 75 per cent of the Fiftieth Regiment now assembled at Camp Dix are reenlisted men who were induced to reenlist because the promise was made that they would not be sent out of this country, that they would do duty in this country, if you please, during these troublesome labor conditions, and that they would be given a chance to learn a trade within a year, so that when discharged at the end of their year's enlistment they would be the better prepared to care for themselves in the civil walks of life. More than 75 per cent of them, after they had come from victory won upon the other side of the sea, are now being sent back over there, not to do the honorable duty of a soldier but to do the duty of a policeman. In doing what? Guard duty, if you please, in Silesia, or worse still perchance to be numbered with the 10,000 other soldier sons of America in faraway Siberia.

I have before me a letter here, which I shall make a part of my remarks, from one man in the Fiftieth Regiment who believed that the country for which he offered his all and gave so much would do something for him to rehabilitate him within the next 12 months. But now he is facing toward the other side, and unless Congress does something in a week he will be again in far away Europe. The Fifth Regiment is in like condition, and I have before me here a pitiful letter from a widow down in Tennessee praying that something will be done to send her boy back to her. He was wounded in the Argonne, once slightly and the other time severely, reenlisted for a year in the Fifth, and now is at Camp Taylor, but they are leaving that camp to be assembled at Camp Meade, where they are to be joined with the Fiftieth and within 20 days sail across the sea; and I say it is a blot upon our fair escutcheon, it is a dishonor to the honor that we are giving to these men to-day who so richly deserve all we are giving them. In doing something for these men I believe it is the duty of this Congress to voice a protest against sending any men across the seas again, and especially those who have been enlisted as these men have been enlisted. Seventy-five per cent of them were promised, if you please, by the agents of the United States that they would not be sent out of this country again.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very much interested in the statement the gentleman is making, and I would like to know by what authority or information the gentleman says 75 per cent of these men voluntarily reenlisted on information and these promises? What information or proof has the gentleman of that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have it on the written statement of a number of these men themselves, one of which I have here before me.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that the only proof? As to 75 per cent voluntarily reenlisting on this information, you have the statement of one man.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not have the statement of 75 per cent, but I take it that this man and the others—and I dare say the gentleman does not wish to discredit them—say that they know that 75 per cent of the Fiftieth enlisted with that understanding. Besides that, I have a circular, posted at Camp Dix, from which this inference can be fairly drawn.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that all the proof the gentleman has?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is not that sufficient?

Mr. CONNALLY. I wanted to see the information the gentleman has that would lead him to make a statement concerning 75 per cent of them, based on a letter from one soldier.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is more than one letter from one soldier. There is also, if you please—and I will make it a part of my remarks, with the permission of the House—a notice showing that these men were induced to believe that if they volunteered for a year they would be engaged all the time within the confines of these large cities of the East, where they would have free access to the advantages of these cities and the recreations and amusements, if you please, and posted by an agent of the Government of the United States.

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman state—and of course if he does, he states it seriously and on his responsibility as a Member of the Congress—that the recruiting officers of the Regular Army are telling men that when they enlist in the Regular Army of the United States that they will not be sent out of this country?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VENABLE. How many cases of that character does the gentleman know about?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I know of at least a dozen cases; and I will put in not only the written word that comes from the man whose letter I have here but I will put in the circulars themselves, posted, if you please, by these recruiting officers as agents of the United States.

Mr. VENABLE. What does the circular say?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The circular says, among other things:

An excellent opportunity is offered to you to enlist in the Regular Army under the new act of Congress governing voluntary enlistments. The following is quoted for your timely information:

You will not be required to serve in the reserve after expiration of your enlistment.

You will not forfeit your bonus of $60 by reenlistment in the Regular Army.

You can get a furlough immediately upon reenlistment to visit your parents, relatives, or friends.

Instead of getting a furlough on their reenlistment they are getting an order to move across the sea.

The circular says, further:

The Fiftieth United States Infantry has vacancies in practically all grades of noncommissioned officers and specialists, and therefore offers to you an excellent opportunity for advancement.

Considering the fact that, in addition to the above-stated inducements, this regiment is stationed in such close proximity to the largest cities and recreation centers in the East, offering an unlimited source for personal recreation and amusement, makes this an opportunity you should not neglect.

And it says to apply for further information, and so forth.

Mr. VENABLE. What is in there now about a pledge that they will not be sent abroad, or in other service they will not leave the United States?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it not a pledge to say to them that during the entire enlistment they will be adjacent to a large city in the East?

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman say that circular says during the entire enlistment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think such an inference may be fairly drawn.

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman take the position——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It says:

Considering the fact that, in addition to the above-stated inducements, this regiment is stationed in such close proximity to the larger cities and recreation centers in the East, offering unlimited source for personal recreation and amusement, makes this an opportunity you should not neglect.

Mr. VENABLE. Now, the gentleman states that in his judgment that statement would mislead a soldier to believe that if he joined that regiment, under no set of circumstances would he be sent out of the United States?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say that would mislead Congressmen here; it would even mislead the wise gentleman from Mississippi when used with the other fair promises of the United States enlisting officers. These men had already done service across on the other side of the sea. They were led to believe they would be given some consideration for that, and then, in addition to that, to receive the promises that they would be permitted to have the opportunity set forth in this circular, taken all together, was sufficient to make any man believe that he would not again be sent overseas. That these alluring advertisements and fair promises made by recruiting officers did cause these men to reenlist is amply evidenced by the following letter:

TRENTON, N. J., September 7, 1919.

Representative WOOD:

Greeting: In looking over the papers I see you, at least, have foresight enough to put up a fight against the Fiftieth and Fifth Infantry from going to Siberia.

But do you know that the men that are to be sent overseas are nearly all ex-A. E. F. men, who reenlisted at the "request" of recruiting teams, to tide them over the "awful" labor conditions that are prevailing or are supposed to prevail, that a permanent post in the States was offered them.

That they were told on reenlisting for one year they would not go out of the States only on a three-year enlistment.

That they were to be the "guests" of Uncle Sam for one year, being overseas men.

That they could learn a trade and at the end of the year they could go out of the Army better fitted for civil life.

That three-fourths of the Fiftieth Infantry, maybe a higher percentage, are reenlisted men for one year.

That there are men with as much service as 22 months in France, wearing wound stripes, and not back in the United States 6 weeks and ordered to go overseas.

That England is afraid to send soldiers to Russia, because very probably the soldiers would refuse to go.

That I think Secretary of War Baker does not know the true facts of so many overseas men in the Fiftieth.

That in E Company, Fiftieth Regiment, about 110 or more out of 125—110 out of 125!—are one year reenlisted guests of Uncle Sam.

I myself had the "Overseas men of Dix protest against order" piece, published myself.

Get some action, and d—n quick. Heroes of the battle fields to be sent back to police Silesia! Get after it.

If you want to know who I am, well, I am only a buck private in the Fiftieth. Formerly a Twenty-ninth Division man.

——— ———.

One year overseas; 29 months' service in khaki.

I have intentionally omitted reading the name of this soldier into the RECORD; to do so would in all probability subject him to the fury of a "Hard boiled" Smith or some similar officer ever anxious to use his power, and besides, these poor soldiers will have trouble enough before they are free men again. Yet we are told by our President that we entered this war to make the world safe for democracy. It now begins to look like we got into it to furnish policemen for the world.

Here is another letter from a good mother down in Tennessee:

DICKSON, TENN.,
September 3, 1919.

Representative WOOD,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I appeal to you to use your influence in obtaining the release from the Army service of my son, Pvt. Homer S. Richardson, Company E, Fifth Infantry, now stationed at Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky. I am informed that the Fifth Infantry has been ordered to Europe on September 7. Beg leave to ask your kind consideration in regard to my son. He has seen foreign service; was one of the first to be sent to Europe after America entered the war; was wounded twice, first time slightly, last time seriously; has a good military record.

I beg leave to say further that I am a widow woman with three small children. My health is broken down and I am unable to do any kind of work. My son is the only support I have, and that the salary he earns in the Army is insufficient to feed and clothe us.

Please, sir, I will be very thankful if you might lend your help in obtaining his release.

Very truly,

Mrs. ANNIE RICHARDSON.

No doubt there are hundreds of other mothers throughout the land who have sons in one or the other of these regiments who are in the same distressed condition that this poor woman is. Will we hear the prayers and petitions of these good women and then turn a deaf ear to them, or will we do all that lies in our power to do, namely, protest in their names and in the name of all the people as their Representatives against the consummation of this outrage. That if the President as commander in chief of the Army persists in sending their boys to Europs to do police duty his will be the blame and not ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment:

Strike out all after the word "appoint" in line 3, page 1, down to and including the word "they" in line 6, said page, and insert the following:

By selection and promotion two permanent admirals in the United States Navy, the said admirals, when so appointed—

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make the bill conform to the precedents, which are that the name of the officers promoted shall not be used in the bill, the reason obviously being that under the Constitution the President has the sole appointive power in the naming of officers. It also makes the bill conform to the military bill recently enacted, to make Gen. Pershing the general of the Army. His name was not mentioned in the bill, as will be recalled. It also conforms to the precedent set in President Arthur's time, when Congress passed a bill restoring Fitz John Porter to his previous rank and the President vetoed the bill on the ground that it would infringe on his constitutional prerogative. Therefore the committee believe that the amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Should the title of the bill be amended now in committee or later in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. After the passage of the bill.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7767) to appoint Admiral William S. Benson, United States Navy, and Rear Admiral William S. Sims, United States Navy, as permanent admirals in the Navy, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is considered ordered upon the bill and amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think this bill should be passed by a quorum. I therefore make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] No quorum is present. Therefore automatically the doors are closed, and the Sergeant at Arms will summon the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the passage of the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 245, nays 9, answered "present" 1, not voting 175, as follows:

Mr. VOLSTEAD. As it passed the Senate, with the Senate amendments numbered.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of after-the-war readjustment of economic conditions and the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of readjustment after the European war. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether or not it is on constructive legislation that the gentleman is proposing, now before the House, that he wishes to extend his remarks?

Mr. CURRY of California. It is on constructive legislation, some of it that is before the House, but none, however, that I have presented.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on the subject of the league of nations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on the subject of the league of nations. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, when does the gentleman desire to address the House?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Immediately.

Mr. GARD. Is there no further regular business for the day, may I ask the leader of the majority?

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far as I am informed, there is no further legislative business for to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will indulge me, is it intended to have any more speeches this afternoon after this one?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not that I am aware of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the letters that have recently passed between the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the President of the United States, in which it appears that the President has declined to acquaint the treaty-ratifying branch of the Congress with the provisions of the special agreement of June 16 relative to the Rhine district, brings to the mind of the Congress and the people some of the reasons why the great majority of the citizens of this country have within the past 8 or 10 months changed their position from a majority favoring a league of nations to a great majority urgently opposed to the league of nations which is now before us.

That a considerable majority of the people of the United States eight months ago were in favor of the adoption of a suitable league of nations or some similar provision that would reduce the chances of war to a minimum I believe can be clearly shown. Public opinion has, however, so greatly changed in the past few months that it is perfectly clear to every fair-minded, unbiased person who is keeping in touch with the public pulse that a referendum taken on the adoption of the proposed league of nations without amendment would be defeated by at least a two-thirds majority. Some of us are receiving letters and petitions now from persons urging us to use our influence against the adoption of the league of nations who seven or eight months ago petitioned us very earnestly to use our influence in favor of the adoption of a league of nations.

The question arises, what has occasioned this great change of front on the part of the American people? In brief, the change is a result of the difference between the people's first conception of the ideal of an abstract league of nations and the facts as set forth in the provisions now included in the proposed concrete league of nations. Everybody desires to avoid the horrors of war. There is no difference of opinion on that subject. The difference arises concerning the means to be used to reach the much-desired result.

Prior to the time the definite draft was before the people for consideration the theoretic assumption that a league of nations would keep us out of war was very generally accepted, and public opinion was favorably molded accordingly; but since the exact draft of the league has been before the people and opportunity has been realized for careful study and discussion of its provisions very serious questions have arisen as to whether or not the provisions of the league when once accepted will not in reality greatly increase rather than diminish the prospects for future warfare. An abstract idea and a concrete plan may differ very greatly. [Applause.]

In the case of the league of nations this difference is almost as wide and marked as the difference between the two magnetic poles. The people have begun to wonder whether in asking for "a fish" they are to receive a "scorpion," whether in their cry "for bread" they have received "a stone," whether in their demand for "a fig" they are to be given "a thistle," whether in answer to their prayer that "knives and swords shall be beaten into pruning hooks and plowshares" they are to see pruning hooks and plowshares beaten into knives and swords. Many are the cases on record where purely innocent people have gone to the medicine case and by mistake taken poison when their purpose was to take a curative remedy.

By way of digression I received an amusing letter from a farmer in the South who says, among other things, that he was now past 60 years of age, that he had spent the most of his life in trying to sing correctly "My country, 'tis of thee," but now he says if this scheme is carried out I will have to spend the rest of my life learning to sing "My countries, 'tis of those." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes; I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I take it that the gentleman is in favor of a league of nations to enforce peace, is he not?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I am in favor of an international court of some kind at which will be settled international disputes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of the people of Nebraska swinging away from the document dealing with peace. I want to tell the gentleman that the President is in his State to-day, and after this time he will find his people swinging back to that document. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I wish to say to the gentleman that the President is pretty well known in that part of the country, and as he goes across Nebraska to-day and makes the statement that if his league is adopted without amendment "the khaki-clad boys of this country will never again cross the Atlantic," the people out there know that he is pouring it out of the same bottle from which formerly came "He kept us out of war" and "Politics is adjourned." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. AYRES. Did not the President keep us out of war as long as any respecting peace President or red-blooded American could keep us out?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that at the time the President was allowing the claim to be made all over the country that he kept us out of war he knew, and his Cabinet knew, that we were rushing into war. I was one of a number called down here two months after the President's inauguration in May, 1917, with a company of 190 or more educators, and we were told by a member of the Cabinet that they knew a year before war was declared that war was absolutely inevitable, and yet they went clear through the presidential campaign using the slogan "He kept us out of war." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I can not yield further now. After I have concluded my remarks, if I have time, I will answer any questions.

Mr. Speaker, the growing opposition to the constitution of the league of nations has been stimulated by two conditions: First, the policy and methods under which the league document conceived its form; and, second, the actual provisions of the document itself. Let us consider, briefly, these two reasons in the order named.

In the first place, the people were led to believe a year ago or less that the treaty-ratifying body of the Congress would be kept in closest touch with the United States Peace Commission throughout all the deliberations at Paris. The people were informed by the President himself that such would be the case, and realizing that the very nature of the world-wide war in which we had been engaged was such that in its settlement provisions of a more or less revolutionary character might be recommended, the public had a right to expect, as a result of these conditions as well as a result of the assurance given them by the President, that all of the matters under discussion at Paris and the conclusions resulting therefrom would be an open book to the Congress and the country. "Open agreements openly arrived at" was the slogan given out by the administration and quite agreeably accepted by the people.

I might say in passing that when the immortal McKinley was negotiating a treaty at the close of the Spanish-American War he kept members of the Foreign Relations Committee well and constantly informed as to every proposed article of the treaty, and made sure of the fact before giving his sanction to any article that the same would meet with the approval of the men whose constitutional duties required their ratification. [Applause.]

In the present instance one of the first great disappointments that came to the public after the cables and telegraph facilities of the country had been taken over by an Executive order, under the pretext that such action was to insure free and constant communication between the peace commission and the Senate, was to find, to their great regret, that this action was taken for the purpose of withholding and suppressing news rather than conveying the same. Wires were filled more particularly with social events engaged in by members of the peace commission rather than for the purpose of conveying clear information as to the points under discussion. Thousands of earnest parents who desired to cable money to convalescing sons in France who were in great need found that it took from three to four weeks to get cables through, and in many instances were entirely unable to cable at all, while at the same time the newspapers were full of cabled material describing at length the social functions enjoyed by members of the peace commission and the kind and manner of clothes and dress that were worn by members of the party. [Applause.]

The people were also of the impression that the so-called 14 points announced by our Chief Executive were to be the basis of settlement in the negotiations, and that the draft for a league of nations would be presented by Americans. It has gradually developed that the 14 points were given practically no consideration at the peace table, and that the American draft for a league of nations, if there ever was one, was never even presented, but that in place thereof a British draft was presented, and has been accepted almost in its entirety.

Another assurance the people believed they had when the American commission set sail for Paris was that careful and accurate records would be kept of all questions under discussion and finally submitted in their systematic and scientific completeness to the people of the country for their enlightenment. As one chief encouragement to this end we were informed through the press that our peace commissioners had taken with them 1,300 or more experts, historians, economists, accountants, and so forth, who had the latest and most accurate knowledge of all of the conditions existing in all of the various countries of the world as to Government boundaries, economic conditions, and so forth. It was but a natural inference to conclude that when the President returned from Paris, in the event that such detailed information as might be expected from such a well-composed commission had not been furnished the people in advance, the President would bring with him in complete and systematic files the detailed results of all of the expert help and advice he had received from this great army of specialists at Paris, whose entertainment will cost the Government several million dollars.

In view of these facts, it was a distinct shock to the American people to read the following letter which appeared in the Associated Press late last month, written by the President, in answer to an inquiry made by the Foreign Relations Committee:

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of July 22, requesting me, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to send the committee the agreement referred to in article 237 of the treaty with Germany, in the event that such an agreement has been determined upon by the allied and associated Governments, I would say that so far as I know such an agreement has not yet been reached. As I recollect the business, an attempt was being made to reach such an agreement, but I have not yet learned of an agreement having been arrived at.

May I not add, with regard to other requests which I have received from the committee for papers and information of various sorts, that I was not able to bring from Paris a complete file of papers. I brought with me only those which happened to be in my hands when I left France. These alone constitute a considerable mass of papers, and I have been going over them as rapidly as time and my engagements permitted, and must beg the committee's indulgence for the delay in informing them which I can supply them with.

Very sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

You will note in this letter the President uses the expression, as he recollects the business, and so forth, answering entirely from memory, and then adds that when he left Paris he brought with him only those papers which happened to be in his hands. The question logically arises in the mind of an earnest, clear-reasoning public, why, after going to the expense of taking an army of experts to Paris, should the President on his return hurriedly grab up a few promiscuous papers and not even know on his return home what these few papers contain?

It has further developed in the negotiations of the last six weeks that the final draft of the treaty of peace was furnished to commercial interests of New York and other sections of the country before the same was furnished to the treaty-ratifying body of Congress. It later developed that the President agreed specifically with the authorities of France to present the special agreement with the French Republic at the same time the general treaty was presented. The special agreement with France was not presented at the time the treaty of peace was referred to the Senate and was not presented for a considerable time thereafter; in fact, this specific agreement was forced from the hands of the President after this country was advised by information from Europe that the President had not complied with his special agreement to present both pacts at the same time. It has also developed that a number of provisions necessary for the proper understanding of the treaty itself have been withheld from the Foreign Relations Committee and have only been reluctantly and meagerly supplied under pressure.

It was a further source of disappointment when the President in presenting the peace treaty on July 10 to the treaty-ratifying body of the Congress made no explanation whatever of the provisions of the treaty, but indulged in an eulogy of the American soldiers and entered into a wordy, idealistic discourse almost entirely apart from the provisions of the league itself. The provisions of the treaty were passed with the following single reference:

In one sense, no doubt, there is no need that I should report to you what was attempted and done at Paris. You have been daily cognizant of what was going on there.

Now, put by the side of this statement the fact that authentic news of the development at Paris was withheld from Congress and the people all the time, and that the only news we received was that which merely leaked through from unofficial sources.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that his colleague's time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he intends to give the text of the league covenant that he would be in favor of and would represent the league of nations that he says that he and his people want. Can the gentleman give us the text? He has been talking about something else. Now, does the gentleman intend to give us the text of the proposed league which he favors?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. The gentleman knows full well it would be impossible for anyone to cover the text of a new league of nations in 10 minutes, but I wish to say to the gentleman I do desire——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman could say what is wrong with the present text.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I expect to do that.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this request meet with the approval of the leader of the majority? Does it conflict with the tentative plan of recognizing the other gentleman from Nebraska?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in the light of these facts which are now common knowledge, it occurs to me that the criticism of the few who are now charging that those sincere, patriotic statesmen who are seeking to go to the bottom of the league of nations document which has been inseparably connected with the peace treaty will find their criticisms falling on deaf ears.

Just before the President set sail for Paris the second time he declared in his Boston speech, referring to the opposition of certain men to the proposed league of nations—

I should welcome no sweeter challenge than that. I have fighting blood in me, and it is sometimes a delight to let it have scope, but if it is a challenge on this occasion it will be an indulgence.

Putting it all together, the people are warranted in reaching the conclusion that the President willfully set himself over against and opposite, if need be, the convictions of Congress and the will of the American people; that he determined to take the bits in his own teeth and push through his own program, everybody else to the contrary notwithstanding. It is therefore poor judgment and ill-advised conduct for anyone to question or attempt to impune the motives and deliberations of the Foreign Relations Committee in their sincere, prayerful endeavor to properly interpret the league of nations now under consideration and to safeguard if possible the blood-bought liberties of our people and the sovereignty of our Government. [Applause.]

The American people are wholly justified in raising a great question mark, both as to the fairness and the propriety of our peace commission enshrouding the league of nations and the peace treaty from the beginning of the deliberations down to the present time in mystery and uncertainty. It is no wonder that public opinion has swung about until we are now faced with almost unanimous objection to the league of nations.

In the second place, a study of the text of the league itself reveals the fact that several of its provisions when once agreed to may prove to be a very serious handicap to this Government and will in all probability result in aggravated and almost constant warfare instead of promoting the era of peace for which we are all praying. The League for the Preservation of American Independence has published—

TWENTY-FOUR REASONS WHY THE UNITED STATES SHOULD NOT ENTER THE PROPOSED LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

(1) Because the covenant of the league of nations, as proposed, was, in substance, written by Gen. Smuts, an Englishman, for England, indorsed by powerful English propaganda, to secure world-wide English domin' , and not by an American for America.

(2) Because in these days of foreign propaganda in the American press neither Congress nor the public can reach a deliberate, unbiased judgment upon the questions involved in the proposed league of nations, which are so vital to the existence of American independence.

(3) Because it places the United States Government under alien rules without the consent of the people governed, the covenant declaring that the league shall be governed by an assembly consisting of one vote from each nation, and a council, or executive committee, of five (which may be increased to nine), and in which the United States can not vote upon any matter in which it is interested.

(4) Because under the covenant a state of war exists, ipso facto, whenever any nation refuses to obey orders of the league, or whenever any nation engages in war or invades the territories of another nation, and this may mean a constant state of war.

REQUIRES THAT OUR NATION MAINTAIN ARMIES ABROAD.

(5) Because in these wars to which the United States will be a party in every instance this Government will be required to maintain permanent armies upon foreign soil, where the blood of Americans will be spilled to promote foreign interests.

(6) Because it pledges the lives and property of the American people to uphold and enforce the domination of England over her vast possessions in Ireland, India, Africa, Australia, Canada, and other parts of the world.

(7) Because it pledges the lives and property of Americans to perpetuate the stranglehold of Japan over 10,000,000 people of Korea, and over 40,000,000 of Chinese, with whom we are at peace, and other territorial grants and powers in China of unknown extent.

(8) Because it guarantees the lives and property of Americans to enforce the recently acquired domination of Italy over various peoples and countries east of the Adriatic and in the Tyrol.

(9) Because it pledges the lives and property of Americans to maintain the territorial possessions of all the members of the league.

(10) Because it does not limit the armaments of England upon the oceans, nor her ships of war, nor her fortresses upon and around the coasts of the United States.

MENACES OUR PROTECTION OF PACIFIC OCEAN.

(11) Because it menaces our protection and control in the Pacific Ocean by conceding to Japan islands of the Pacific formerly owned by Germany.

(12) Because under the agreements set forth in the covenant, the United States can no longer protect the United States borders against Mexico and the marauding bands of that country without the consent of European, Asiatic, and African powers.

(13) Because it destroys the Monroe doctrine. It submits to the league all questions at issue between the United States and any foreign country, or in which it is even claimed that the question is international in character or likely to provoke war, and leaves to the United States no authority or power to protect the interests of Americans, which we have struggled for a century to maintain.

(14) Because upon the principles set forth in the covenant the United States will lose control of the Panama Canal.

(15) Because under the covenant of the league the United States will lose control over restriction of immigration from Japan, China, and other foreign countries.

AS MANY VOTES FOR LIBERIA AS FOR UNITED STATES.

(16) Because in the council of five, which may be increased to nine, there will be four or eight votes, as the case may be, to the one vote of the United States, whereas the United States has the wealth, productive capacity, and progressiveness of all those nations combined.

(17) Because the covenant grants to England and her colonies, which have half the wealth and resources, and, counting only whites, little more than half of the population of the United States, six votes in the assembly of nations, and grants to the United States and her 48 sovereign States, all combined, but one vote in the assembly.

(18) Because it grants to the little half-baked countries of Liberia and Haiti, Siam, Hedjaz, and numerous others, of South America and Europe, the same representation in the assembly as has been given to the United States.

(19) Because it grants to South America, including Cuba and Haiti (with much less than half the wealth of the United States), 16 votes in the assembly of nations as against the single vote of the United States.

(20) Because the covenant violates the United States Constitution by depriving Congress of the power to declare war.

(21) Because it violates the Constitution by incurring pecuniary obligations for an indefinite period, which is solely vested in Congress.

ENORMOUS WAR POWERS GIVEN THE PRESIDENT.

(22) Because it places in permanent bondage all the peoples of the earth under the domination of a comparatively few people of western Europe and the British Empire.

(23) Because in times of war it will be claimed that the guarantees of the United States Constitution and of the State constitutions are suspended by the war power, and the constant condition of war in which we will have entered as parties to every controversy and dispute between different nations of the earth, will maintain in perpetuity those arrogated powers. The importance of this point is well illustrated by the fact that more than 20 wars are being waged at this time.

(24) Because the enormous war powers of the President will thus become permanent. He already has the appointing power. He has the veto power over acts of Congress, equal to one-third of both Senate and House. He is Commander in Chief of the Army and of the Navy. Under the league of nations and a perpetual condition of war in which we are bound to engage, these war powers will become paramount in perpetuity. The President of the United States, subject only to the league of nations, will become our permanent dictator.

Referring to that portion of the foregoing statement of the League for the Preservation of American Independence, relating to the protection of the Pacific, the address of Admiral Jellicoe to the New England Club at Wellington, New Zealand, under date of September 2 has a peculiar significance. In considering the subject, "A British Fleet in the Pacific," the admiral, among other statements, included the following:

Without the British mercantile marine, the war would have been over long ago, probably in 1915; and I am unable to say what would have happened to New Zealand. A look around the world shows that the millennium is as far off as ever.

The Pacific is growing daily in importance. It contains great possibilities of trouble which statesmen could better overcome with a strong force behind them. Trade protection requires more vessels than ever, the criterion being not the number of enemy cruisers but the number of our merchantmen, and the value of our trade.

The openly announced purpose of Great Britain to maintain a large fleet in the Pacific probably meets with the approval of the American peace commission, which seemed to agree at Paris that England should be conceded the right to maintain the largest navy in the world, no matter what the future needs or desires of other countries might prove.

The purpose of Great Britain to maintain a standing army of 900,000 men is in entire agreement with her great naval program. Japan also announces that she will soon launch a great navy-building program. Our own Secretary of War is urging a standing Army of 576,000 men and a system of universal military training which will hold over 600,000 young men in reserve each year. We have already sent a large fleet into the Pacific. All of this program in face of the fact that we are regularly and constantly advised by the friends of the league of nations that it will keep us out of war. Articles 10 to 13 of the league inform us that "league members shall undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league, and that any threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league," and further, that "any dispute likely to lead to a rupture" will be a matter of concern to the league, and so forth. Article 22 provides for the mandatory control of all of the peoples of the world who are deemed by the council of the league to be incapable of self-government. The purpose of the league to guarantee the territorial integrity of all of the nations subscribing to it makes the following article, published in the London Times and the Washington Post under date of August 16, of a special significance. It must be remembered in considering this article that the King of Hedjaz is to be a member of the league. The article is as follows:

KING OF HEDJAZ IN DESPERATE WAR—FIGHTS ARAB PURITANS WHO OPPOSE POLYGAMY AND SMOKING.

LONDON, August 16.

Only scanty information has been published respecting hostilities between King Hussein of the Hedjaz and Ibn Saud of Nejd. They were reported to have arisen from a dispute as to the ownership of the district of Khurman, 16 miles northeast of Taif, but there lies behind them a new puritanical movement of great significance.

Ibn Saud, who defeated the forces under Abdulla, the son of King Hussein, so thoroughly that a march into Medina seemed practicable, is at the head of a reform movement now growing very rapidly in Arabia, and known as the Akhwan brotherhood. Its tenets are like those of the Wahabb movements, which in the eighteenth century also originated in Arabia, and attacking all luxury, loose administration of justice, and laxity against the infidel, shook the world of Islam to its foundation.

Puritanism is now revived in even stricter form under the name of a Khwan. The movement prescribes only one wife, no drink, no smokes, nothing except prayer and the spread of the reformed faith by every means, including that of armed attack when possible on heretic and infidel alike.

Mr. Speaker, if the adoption of this league of nations shall incur even the probability of the Christian forces of the United States entering into war in Asia with the kings and chiefs of the half-civilized tribes of the world, to assist them in continuing their harems and slaves, it is very fortunate for the American people that certain members of the treaty-ratifying body are asking for time to arrive at a complete understanding of the contents of the league document.

When peace lovers in the United States were discussing in recent by-gone days the feasibility of a league of nations they had in mind a league composed of the so-called civilized nations of the world, whereby disputes might be submitted for arbitration to some properly selected international court, but the framers of the present league have gone so far as to include practically the whole earth in their scheme. A tabulation of the populations of the several countries entering into the league reveals the fact that 89 per cent of the constituents of the league will be colored and 11 per cent white. Liberia, for example, has 50,000 people who might be called civilized and 1,950,000 who are uncivilized, a part of whom are in a state of cannibalism, yet Liberia is to have an equal vote with the United States, with her 110,000,000 population. [Applause.] About two-thirds of the people of the earth are yet in either an uncivilized or semicivilized state, and the league of nations proposes that a few of the more powerful nations, who claim to be blessed with civilization, shall force stabilized government and civilized customs upon all the world at the point of a bayonet.

England has a population of about 50,000,000, but her flag floats over 300,000,000 souls, more than half of whom are in a very crude state of civilization. It can easily be understood why England favors the league of nations. In the first place, she is not required by the provisions of the league to surrender anything, and, in the second place, she needs the other nations of the world to help her exercise the strong hand over the 250,000,000 people of the earth who are struggling to wrest from her the privilege of governing themselves in harmony with an inherent desire born into the life of every person and which no condition or government in this world will ever be able to uproot. It might be better were it otherwise, but it is not, and people prefer in every instance to be permitted to evolve their civilization and their government through their own particular processes and not to have such privileges, so called, forced on them from the outside at the point of a bayonet. [Applause.]

When we consider the state of the world as it is to-day, in the light of common sense as well as the light of history, we are led to conclude that any attempt on the part of stronger nations to assume mandatory control of the multitude of weaker nations of the world will result in constant strife. There have been approximately 3,000 years of authentic history, out of which entire time the world has seen only 60 years of peace—not consecutive years, but 60 years all told.

If the stronger nations attempt police control of the heathen and uncivilized portions of the earth it will require the largest standing armies the world has ever seen, with even heavier burdens of taxes and increased public debts that will ultimately bankrupt all the countries undertaking the program.

Mr. Speaker, I find myself in pretty thorough agreement with that plank in the Democratic platform of 1900 which states, "We are unalterably opposed to seizing distant lands to be governed outside the Constitution and whose people can never become citizens." Of course, there are those who say that the objections to the league are impertinent and far-fetched, and that such difficulties as we seem to see will not materialize; but I submit that it is "a condition and not a theory that confronts us." The very fact that so many leading jurists differ as to the interpretations of the league warns us that our only safe course is to abide by the language itself in the several articles, and if this language is such that we can not accept it in justice to our Constitution and in protection of our future, then the time to make changes or reservations is before the adoption and not after it. [Applause.]

When the United States was negotiating the Louisiana purchase from France, it is said that one of Napoleon's secretaries declared to Napoleon that he believed some of the provisions of the agreement were obscure, whereupon the Emperor told his secretary to examine the agreement very carefully, and if he found any language that was not obscure to make it so. It would seem that the framers of this document must have been governed pretty largely by the policy of Napoleon, to give birth to an instrument that would immediately evoke such a multitude of different interpretations.

I am utterly unable to understand those gentlemen who advocate the acceptance of this document without reservations. They seem to be acting under the hallucination that the gentlemen who sat at the peace table were supermen working under some sort of infallible direction. My own thought is that we have just emerged from this great world struggle in which 7,400,000 men have been killed, 7,145,000 men permanently maimed for life, and $190,000,000,000 of treasure destroyed for the purpose of forever disapproving the fallacy of the superman. It would indeed be a grave mistake at this time to see this great Republic enter into a program that would ultimately shipwreck her on the same autocratic reefs that have brought such disaster to the peoples of Central Europe. [Applause.]

When the Senate had before it the ratification of the agreement of the two Hague tribunals, in both cases that body made the following reservation:

Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon or interfering with or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or international administration of any foreign State. Nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

At the time this reservation was made the people of this country believed it to be a wise act on the part of the Senate; but now there are those who come forward under the direction of the Chief Executive and contend that the document now before us—the most far-reaching and revolutionary document ever considered by the American people—should be accepted line for line and word for word without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." I am one of those who have read with considerable care every speech that has been made at the other end of the Capitol on the subject of the league of nations, and have discovered this fact, as have many others with whom I have conversed, namely, that those who are in favor of the league without change assume, without facing the general world conditions, that the league of nations will keep us out of war, and they proceed to argue wholly from the emotional point of view, dwelling in pathetic terms on the number of lives that have been lost and the property that has been destroyed, and pleading for the adoption of the league in order that such calamities may not again curse the world.

On the other hand, those who are opposing the league in its present form are basing their opposition on clear, cold, logical facts, resulting from an analysis of the provisions of the document and the consideration of the same in the light of history and human nature. The people are refusing to be swayed by emotional pleas, and are yielding to the evidence revealed by the clear, cold, undeniable facts in the premise. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In this, as well as in its every conclusion, democracy has again proven her right to a high place in Government circles. I have the utmost confidence that when the American people are given the facts and have sufficient time to get their bearings they will decide right.

Mr. Speaker, I am among those who desire peace; I am for any international league or agreement in harmony with our Constitution that will keep us out of war; I want peace, but I fear this league will embroil us in constant war and bankrupt our Nation. I will follow any man anywhere that will lead the world into the haven of universal peace, but the very provisions of this league are such on the face of them as to force us into constant warfare. Believing these things sincerely and having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, I must oppose by whatever, direct or indirect, methods at my command the provisions in this league of nations that are not in harmony with our Constitution and the traditions of the American people. In taking this stand I am, in my best judgment, casting my lot with those who are endeavoring to perpetuate the liberties for which Washington and his compatriots fought and died, the unity and integrity of the Nation for which the immortal Lincoln and his loyal soldiery laid down their lives, and the perpetuity of this beloved Republic for which the best and bravest of our young manhood have been so recently sacrificed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended two minutes more.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman has, in his closing remarks, announced himself a very ardent advocate of peace and is very much in favor of a league of nations. Can the gentleman give the House some suggestions which would tend more surely to peace than those contained in the document now before the Senate?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that I think the splendid reservations that have been already suggested on the other side of the Capitol Building, if adopted, will correct the errors that are in the covenant.

Mr. RUCKER. If the treaty is amended, then, as proposed, I take it that the gentleman is for it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. If the treaty is properly amended; yes, I am for it.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman please tell what is a proper amendment? Everybody says "if properly amended."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I have just referred the gentleman to the reservations already proposed in the Senate. And permit me further to say to the gentleman that I am rather astonished, in discussing this subject on the floor of this House, to find such a different expression on the question of the league of nations and the part of the Chief Executive in the same from what I hear frequently in the Democratic cloakrooms. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I may say further to the gentleman that many people in my district would be satisfied with "the 14 points," which were so completely lost in Europe.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. REAVIS. Under the date line of Omaha in this afternoon's papers, in a speech made by the President to-day this statement is made, speaking of the reservations to the league of nations:

> If reservations were put in, Mr. Wilson told them, all that the Senate had written in would have to go back for the consent of Germany.

Does not the gentleman know that at the meeting at the White House between the President and the Committee on Foreign Relations the President admitted that inasmuch as Germany is not a party to the league of nations she would have nothing to do with the reservations?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. That is true. I distinctly recall that when the Foreign Relations Committee was in conference with the President at the White House, Senator FALL called the President's attention to the fact that amendments or reservations to the league covenant would not at all affect the treaty with Germany, inasmuch as Germany is not at present a party to the league of nations, and the President agreed fully with Senator FALL at that time. And I might say to my colleague and the Members of the House, in view of the foregoing facts, I am astonished to have read in the Washington Evening Star that the President to-day declared in his Omaha speech, "If reservations are inserted, the treaty must go back to Germany." The President has evidently forgotten his statement exactly to the opposite to Senator FALL and other members of the committee.

Since gentlemen have raised this question of the President's statements, I wish to quote further from the President as recorded in the noon edition of the Washington Times to-day, in which he says, "I have the greatest respect for the United States Senate, but I have come out to fight for a cause. That cause is greater than the Senate; it is greater than the Government." It is very evident that the President, according to his own language, would even sacrifice this Government in order to have his own particular brand of a league adopted. This statement is in complete harmony with the President's threat in his Boston speech, which I have already quoted. Putting it all in all, it would seem that the President, who has already usurped more power than any king, prince, or potentate in the history of the world, would be further willing to imperil the very foundations and the future of this Republic, and then sally forth in quest of "other worlds to conquer." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] desire recognition this afternoon?

Mr. KINKAID. I do not.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

INVESTIGATION OF SUGAR PRICES, ETC.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may replace on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent without prejudice House resolution 150.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that House resolution 150, to which objection was made on last unanimous-consent day, and which therefore went off the calendar, be replaced on that calendar without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, what is that?

Mr. TINKHAM. In relation to sugar legislation.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman wants it placed in the same position it was in prior to its being stricken off the calendar?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes, without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

H. R. 333. An act providing for the disinterment and removal of the remains of the infant child, Norman Lee Molzahn, from the temporary burial site in the District of Columbia to a permanent burial place was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I dislike to occupy the valuable time of the Senate by undue reference to a subject to which I have already called its attention and concerning which the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] yesterday introduced a joint resolution, accompanied by a courageous and commendable expression of sentiment, which I trust found the approval of every man who heard him.

I must, however, occupy a brief period with the substance of two items in the Washington Post of this morning, one being the report of a committee of the Central Labor Union upon the police situation in the District and the other a telegram from Boston regarding the action of its police union yesterday.

The committee of the Central Labor Union yesterday submitted a report upon the police controversy signed by a number of its officials and occupying about a column of space. I shall not read the entire report, but will ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD. [See Appendix.] The report begins with a statement that—

> The Central Labor Union has heard in wonder and amazement, and has postponed an expression of its feelings thereon until its words temper into that moderation which permits just indignation and resentment to be more appropriately phrased after sober judgment and calm consideration, the untenable dictum of the board of commissioners in its enunciation of its policy.

Judging from the phraseology of the remainder of the communication, I think it would have been well if the postponement had been indefinite, for its language is not that of dispassionate men, and some of its expressions will not, at least I hope will not, receive commendation from any considerable proportion of the community.

Suffice it that the Central Labor Union calls the action of the District Commissioners a "studied insult to labor." That is to say, the executive authority of the District of Columbia has been guilty of a "studied insult" to a private association of individuals by refusing its assent to the association of the police force of the District with the American Federation of Labor.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that if this constitutes an insult, studied or otherwise, it will be possible for an executive body to announce disapproval of anything which the American Federation of Labor wants without insulting it, and should it discharge its lawful duty and observe its oath of office it can not avoid the charge of studied insult. Only by abandoning its obligations can it avoid such a deplorable consequence.

I heard once of a woman who applied to an attorney for a divorce, the ground of her claim being that her husband had refused to present her with a diamond necklace which she wanted, and upon being told that the statute covered no such case as a cause of divorce, she declared the statute to be an insult to the women of the Commonwealth. The insult in the one case seems to be quite as well founded as the insult in the other.

But passing that phase of the matter, I pass to one of the concluding paragraphs to which I invite the especial attention of those Members of the Senate whose slumbers are now disturbed by visions of a future residence in a large white building with a stately portico at the other end of the Avenue.

> And if it be true, as is alleged in the city newspapers, that those in authority have threatened that policemen who retain their affiliation with organized labor shall not be granted the increases in salary to which it is admitted they are entitled, then those in authority are seeking even the very flimsiest excuse for withholding from these tried and proven efficient public servants that which they have earned and should receive; and if it be true, as it is published, that Members of the Senate and of the House indorse the order of the commissioners and would withhold those increases, then the Central Labor Union should ascertain at once whether these allegations reflect correctly the views of the dominant party in Congress, and if they do, then the time has come for organized labor to call upon all Central Labor Unions, all State federations, all local unions, all nationals and internationals, and the American Federation of Labor, and upon all good, law-abiding citizens to center their activities in every State and congressional district with a view to keeping such men forever out of Congress hereafter, and to send others who will be fair and just to the great masses of the American people.

There you have it, Mr. President, in cold type. If the representatives of the people to the Congress of the United States shall hereafter dare to express sentiments not in accord with the requirements or wishes of certain associations of men in this country then they must take notice that at the next election they will be thrown into the discard and men selected as their successors who will heed these admonitions and serve as directed.

Mr. President, some years ago the corporations of this country occupied the same attitude, not so flagrantly perhaps, they were too cunning for that, but they occupied it, nevertheless. Their edicts went forth for the slaughter of every official who opposed their schemes and conspiracies against the general welfare. This was properly and successfully resented, and no class of the community resented it more consistently and violently than the labor organizations of the country. They thus performed a great and patriotic service to the Republic and aided in ridding the public representatives of a menace, tremendously effectual with weak and timid natures and generally successful with that class of public representatives who prefer their jobs to the performance of their duty.

Now, the same evil comes from another direction, identically the policy which the American people have hitherto repudiated, and which they must again repudiate if independence and judgment are to characterize the future deliberations of the American Congress.

The issue plainly stated is, Shall Senators and Representatives hereafter elected wear a collar and chain and be fettered to a private but powerful authority? The challenge to independence is here. It remains to be seen how we shall meet it and what we shall do. One Senator is quoted in this morning's paper as saying that the Myers resolution can not pass the Senate, and I am inclined to think that that is true; but, Mr. President, it can command a yea-and-nay vote, so that the public may learn to the extent to which such a vote may inform them of the individual attitude of the Members of this body upon this all-important question. The substance of the resolution is of no consequence compared with the principle which it now involves.

If it shall be disclosed by such a vote that the majority of the sentiment here is against its adoption, the fact should be known, we should advise our constituency of our attitude, and they can dispose of us as they see fit.

Mr. President, I have said and I repeat that the union of the guardians of the public peace and their absorption into a body alien to the Government in the sense that it is not a public one is subversive of American Government, and, carried to its ultimate analysis, means the transfer of the executive machinery of administration to private control. It means the substitution of the performance of public duty for the principle of allegiance to a federation, whose instructions and directions, however inimical to public welfare, are controlling.

This report affirms that the American Federation is loyal and patriotic. I hope that that is true. I know that it is true, as regards the great body of its membership. I shall make no comment at this time upon certain incidents occurring during the war, which are nevertheless the object of very just criticism in connection with such an assertion; but, assuming that to be true, let me ask why this great interest upon the part of the federation to secure the inclusion within its membership of the police organizations of the different cities of the Union? Why extend its membership so far as to embrace pursuits public or semipublic in their character and possessing none of the features and exposed to none of the dangers and contingencies which confront wage workers in private life?

There was a time not long ago when the police force in any city where strikes prevailed was the subject of animadversion, sometimes of anathema, by those who now insist upon including them within their own organization, the charge then being, of course, that the constabularies were subject to the control of private corporations, which, I regret to say, in some cases was true. The fact of its truth was its own supreme condemnation, for any constabulary force which fails impartially and constantly to perform its duty to the public through a strict compliance with and enforcement of the law is not only a subject of condemnation but those offending should be duly disciplined and punished.

I have said, Mr. President, and it is true, that this alliance in its operations necessarily works actual or potential injury to the public which pays the bill. There is a class of people which always preys upon society and against which the arm of government must always be raised. That is the criminal class; the man and woman who defy the law, who violate its sanctions, who menace society, and whose apprehension for and conviction of crimes are essential to its well-being and preservation. It is hardly necessary to repeat these homely truths. They are so obvious and so essential that any challenge of their value subjects the challenger to the imputation either of ignorance or idiocy. So I affirm, Mr. President, that the District Commissioners, the executives of the District of Columbia under the laws of the United States enacted for that purpose, are discharging an executive duty and discharging it properly, and they need at this time and should have the support of the Congress of the United States. Should they do otherwise than they have done they would, in my judgment, be faithless to the trust imposed on them and therefore justly subject to removal.

I took occasion a day or two ago to make some comments upon the ex parte injunction which one of the courts issued upon the application of the police union against the commissioners. Last Sunday one of the attorneys for the union very properly and appropriately defended the action of the judge through the columns of a morning newspaper—very appropriately, because I regard it as one of the duties of counsel to defend his attitude and the court which agrees with him, whether I accept his argument or not. This Mr. Lambert has done; but, like the skillful attorney that he is, he has shrewdly avoided the main contention, which is jurisdictional, which assails the interference by the judiciary with the executive arm. That is a usurpation of power, each department being coequal and therefore independent of the other.

Whenever the judicial department sees fit by injunctive process or otherwise to interfere with the executive or legislative machinery of the country, except in very rare instances indeed, it commits an act of usurpation, whether designed or not. Fundamentally, therefore, this action of one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is indefensible because beyond the jurisdiction of his court; it is wrong because it is ultra vires. Suppose the United States marshal for this District should come into the Chamber to-morrow and serve upon the Senate an ex parte writ of injunction, bearing the seal of the Supreme Court of the United States and the sign manual of its Chief Justice, prohibiting us from the consideration of the Myers resolution. Would any man defend such action? Methinks I hear some protests emanating from voices hitherto silent upon the identical question which I am discussing, properly denouncing it as an act of usurpation; yet such an instance, Mr. President, would, in my judgment, be no more flagrant than the one which has temporarily tied the hands of the District Commissioners, provided they see fit to respect it. The only difference is one of degree. And I may add that, as an injunction issued ultra vires is void, the commissioners would be fully justified in disregarding its inhibitions.

I come now to the other item in this paper, if I can find it. I thought I could cast my eyes immediately upon it. It is very short, so short that I can almost state it verbatim. It is from Boston, and dated September 8, and to the effect that "the Boston police union to-day voted for a strike to become effectual to-morrow afternoon at 5.30 o'clock."

The members of the Boston police union, in other words, at 5.30 o'clock this afternoon will suspend their functions, disregard the obligations imposed upon them as guardians of the peace, for which service they are paid from the public funds, stand aside, and let the forces which prey upon society work their will. They do not propose to lift a finger to enforce the public peace, to see to the prevalence of law and order, or otherwise to discharge the duties for which they are employed and paid and which in some cities they are bound by an oath of office to execute. Anything in a great modern city in these days is liable to occur even with every law officer vigilant and at his post; everything may occur when the guardians of the peace tacitly or actively unite with its disturbers, when the policeman and the thief are, consciously or unconsciously, working in a common direction and for a common purpose, when the officer of the law and the violator of the law may act on a tacit understanding, when the inaction of the one spells opportunity for the other.

I see no reason to hope that the American Federation of Labor, however patriotic or law-abiding, will order these men to perform their duties; and, if they did, it would be a recognition of the sinister fact that not the government of the city of Boston but the head of an unincorporated association is the dictator of the public peace and the master of the metropolitan police of one of our greatest cities.

Mr. President, as regards my future I would rather that it ended at this moment than keep silence when a crisis of this sort confronts the country. If these influences, fully aroused and organized, are to be used for my political undoing, I welcome it; I would rather pass into oblivion with a sense of duty performed or attempted than hold the highest position within the gift of the people at the expense of my official independence. I would rather bear any punishment than confront the reproach that I cowered before conditions facing my country when my conscience requires that I should speak.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I would suggest there, as illustrating the spirit which is back of this movement to give the American Federation of Labor control of the police forces of the country, that I notice in the same report from which the Senator has been reading this morning that all organizations of union labor all over the United States are called upon by that report to unite to keep out of Congress forever all Members of Congress who oppose putting the police under the jurisdiction of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. THOMAS. I read it into the RECORD; and my courageous colleague from Montana may be very largely to blame for the announcement. If yesterday he had sat quietly in his seat, and kept his tongue between his teeth, and folded his hands, and contented himself by whispering in the cloakroom that "he did not know what was going to happen, but he thought somebody ought to do something," the chances are that this fulmination would not have appeared this morning.

Mr. MYERS. I will only say that I am willing to accept not only the blame but the responsibility, whatever it may be.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. President, Boston is one of the oldest cities of the Union. Her proudest boast is that she is the cradle of American liberty, the birthplace of American freedom, the spot in New England where true Americanism was born and first asserted itself. It remains for the good old city to vindicate that claim by her conduct on this occasion. If she has retained the Americanism of Bunker Hill and of the Civil War—aye, if she still has the spirit which she displayed during the great struggle just ended—her citizens will unite, take up the discarded batons of her police force, and see to it that order and law and justice prevail, and also that every derelict official be summarily and permanently dismissed from the public service.

Let me conclude, Mr. President, by reading into the RECORD a sentiment from America's greatest mayor—I refer to Mayor Hanson, of Seattle—who, face to face with a far more serious condition, met and overcame it like the man that he is; a far better American citizen than many who were born in this country, but who to-day are too timid to assert the Americanism which was their fathers.' He said:

> I take the position that our duty as citizens stands ahead of any demand of any organization on the face of the earth. The union men, the business men, the churchmen, must, first of all, be citizens. Any man who owes a higher allegiance to any organization than he does to the Government should be sent to a Federal prison or deported.

Who dares deny the soundness of that doctrine? What true American will challenge it? Mr. President, these words should be inscribed in letters of gold upon the lintels of every national and State and municipal legislative hall. They should sink deep into the hearts and strengthen the resolutions of every man summoned by his fellow citizens to serve them in public affairs.

APPENDIX.

THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The complete report of the committee is as follows:

"The Central Labor Union has heard in wonder and amazement, and has postponed an expression of its feelings thereon until its words temper into that moderation which permits just indignation and resentment to be more appropriately phrased after sober judgment and calm consideration, the untenable dictum of the board of commissioners in its enunciation of his policy and in the unwarranted order addressed to the policemen's union directing the members, under penalty of dismissal, to sever their relations in affiliation with the American Federation of Labor and of this Central Labor Union.

"The Central Labor Union, after due deliberation, would be unjust to itself and unregardful of its dignity and traditions were it not to express itself in no uncertain terms touching what was and is, to say the least, an aspersion upon the good name and patriotism of organized labor, an aspersion which, indeed, is tantamount to a studied insult; and if it be true, though this union has every reason to doubt the published statement that the announced policy of the commissioners, since temporarily enjoined by the court, is indorsed by their superiors, then the aspersion, the insult, is all the more lamentable, because concurred in by higher authority.

NO OBJECTION TO CLERKS.

"From no source whatever has there arisen objection to the Federal Employees' Union as such, nor to its affiliation with the American Federation of Labor and with this Central Labor Union. Moreover, the Federal Employees' Union has received and is receiving the approval and commendation of the executive authorities, because it is doing everything within its power to promote the efficiency of the public service; and this is as true of the various teachers' unions, the firemen's union, and other unions whose membership is composed exclusively or so largely of Government employees, all of whom are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and this body.

"There can be no question whatever respecting the loyality and patriotism of organized labor; it has been proved during the most recent few years that no body of citizens contributed more nor under more adverse conditions than did organized labor toward the winning of the great World War, and any reflection, even by innuendo, upon organized labor by even a petty official touching it through Americanism can not be permitted to pass without our indignant yet dignified protest.

"Organized labor is composed of long-suffering but law-abiding citizens, to whom our form of government and the American understanding thereof is just as precious as it may seem to be to any misguided or self-appointed censor or mentor taking upon himself by assuming to himself the authority to limit the rights and liberties of any body of citizens sworn to uphold the Constitution and the laws, but going further than that in casting or attempting to cast a stigma upon millions of American citizens, every one of them as good a citizen as himself and just as loyal, patriotic, and as thoroughly American.

STANDS FOR LAW AND ORDER.

"Organized labor stands for law and order, and members of unions have been and are and always will be among the first to assist the recognized authorities in the upholding of the law, the protection of life and property, and the right of the people to pursue their own substantial happiness. If there have been acts of radicals at times, they have not been the acts of organized labor, and organized labor is no more responsible for such undesirables than is society or the great majority of citizens for the criminals who violate the laws daily throughout the land.

"The Central Labor Union denies that the policemen's union, in continuing its affiliation with organized labor, will be subjected to any divided authority; that union will be American first, its members true to their obligation to be loyal to the recognized authorities; and this far-fetched reason alleged by the chairman of the board for the annunciated policy loses all its force and lightweightedness in the well-known fact that there would have been no such policy announced, no such order promulgated if the policemen's union had admitted members of the police force ranking higher than privates. What would have made an alleged improper affiliation proper in that union admitting sergeants and captains and the inside ring, if there was such a great moral and administrative principle involved in affiliation?

"And if it be true, as is alleged in the city newspapers, that those in authority have threatened that policemen who retain their affiliation with organized labor shall not be granted the increases in salary to which it is admitted they are entitled, then those in authority are seeking even the very flimsiest excuse for withholding from these tried and proven efficient public servants that which they have earned and should receive; and if it be true, as it is published, that Members of the Senate and of the House indorse the order of the commissioners and would withhold those increases, then the Central Labor

Union should ascertain at once whether these allegations reflect correctly the views of the dominant party in Congress; and if they do, then the time has come for organized labor to call upon all Central Labor Unions, all State federations, all local unions, all nationals and internationals, and the American Federation of Labor, and upon all good, law-abiding citizens to center their activities in every State and congressional district, with a view to keeping such men forever out of Congress hereafter and to send others who will be fair and just to the great masses of the American people.

"It is gratifying in this respect to note that various bodies of citizens in no manner allied with organized labor denounce the policy and the order of the commissioners. The position taken by the board on this question is merely another grievance added to the number of grievances of the people of the District against the form of local government under which they have chafed, until now they have become so restless and so dissatisfied that they are unifying against a commissioner form of government for this great city, a government answerable to no one, in which the people themselves have no voice."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

There has just been brought to me a copy of the New York Tribune of Tuesday, September 9, a paper whose accuracy of expression is generally recognized, yet I find the following on the first page:

The President's statement that reservations to the league of nations covenant would send the treaty back to Germany for approval caused indignation among Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee, in view of his admission to them at the White House conference that this would not be necessary.

But more surprising to them was the President's firm insistence that reservations in the resolution of ratification must be beaten, in view of the wholesale desertions from the administration camp of Democratic Senators. Before Mr. Wilson went away it was known that of the Democratic Senators REED, GORE, THOMAS, and WALSH would vote for reservations. Since he left town the following have been added to the list: SHIELDS, HOKE SMITH, SIMMONS, OVERMAN, ELLISON D. SMITH, ASHURST, MYERS, and CULBERSON.

News that Mr. CULBERSON had studied the league covenant and treaty carefully and could not bring himself to support them without reservations, which, in his opinion, were necessary to protect America's interests, was a more severe jolt than any of the administration leaders have yet received. Senator CULBERSON is not only a strong friend of the administration but a close friend of years of Col. E. M. House in Texas politics.

Mr. President, whatever I may do—vote for the treaty or against it, for reservations or against them, for amendments or against them—I have never said to anybody what I was going to do. This reporter, whom I know well, a very intelligent and an honest young man, possesses a keenness of perception that I did not know before anybody had, because I have never said, as I recall—and I recall a vast deal of what I have said—that I would vote for reservations or against reservations. I have never said that I would vote for amendments or against amendments. But I did say this, Mr. President, that Woodrow Wilson is now hotly pursued; that even if I were inclined to be against him, I am of that sort of composition that if a man has but one friend in all Syracuse, and I am that one, when he is in danger I will be at his side; so you can judge from that how I feel about the situation.

Now, I shall say a word with reference to my dear friend, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], whose ability and whose judgment I need not eulogize here. I want to say that he tells me that that alleged interview with him and the statement which attributes to him the attitude of being opposed to the treaty and in favor of reservations is wholly unauthorized and that such statement was made without his consent and does not represent his views at all.

FOREIGN FINANCIAL OPERATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page 8 as amended.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. EDGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The House text being restored, the Senator from New Jersey moves to strike out, beginning on line 5, page 8, with the words "Any member," all down to and including the words "No such," at the end of line 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with line 2, on page 8, it is proposed to strike out all of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Shareholders in any corporation organized under the provisions of this section shall be liable for the contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporation to the extent of double the amount of their stock subscriptions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the banking corporations organized under this proposed law would be permitted to receive deposits just the same as Federal reserve banks. I think the shareholders of institutions which are not only permitted to receive deposits but are permitted to issue their bonds should have imposed upon them the same liability that is imposed upon shareholders in the Federal Reserve System. I believe it is for the benefit of the shareholders who may hold shares in these institutions that we make it a double liability. I do not believe that these people who invest their money and go into this new field would care to have it said that they are a sort of a "blue-sky" organization with a single liability. I think they would be glad to have it known, not only throughout this country but throughout the whole world, that there is a double liability behind every share of stock.

Let me say to the Senators that this question is more vital with reference to a double liability with respect to these organizations than it is with respect to ordinary banking organizations, because the capitalization of these foreign banks will be, and necessarily must be, enormously large.

Do we want the people of this country who invest their earnings in small amounts to buy debenture bonds issued by corporations authorized by Congress to transact this business, and then say, "You shall take your chances with a single liability"? I am sure, Mr. President, very few Members of the Senate will agree to a proposition of that sort, and make it possible for a certain class of people to invest any amount of money and to be responsible for only a single liability.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question, in order to be clear in my own mind about his amendment. Does the Senator propose that simply the original subscribers to the stock shall be under a double liability, or does he mean that anyone who owns stock in a bank, it having been paid for in full, is still liable for the amount of the stock which he holds?

Mr. GRONNA. I mean, as the Senator states, that any stockholder shall be doubly liable, and if my amendment does not do that I shall be very glad to accept an amendment to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure most people believe that a banking institution should carry with it a double liability upon the part of stockholders. It is almost universal in this country, and very wisely universal. But I doubt whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota would have just that effect. He uses the words "double the amount of his subscription." He may not be a subscriber at all, for stockholders in such institutions change from time to time. I suggest that the Senator consider that thought, and see if we can not put it upon the same ground exactly that we have put all other banking institutions.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator absolutely. I want to do exactly what the Senator says he is in favor of, and if my amendment does not cover it I shall be glad to accept an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. May I suggest an amendment to the Senator that will cover the situation and make it conform exactly with the national-bank law?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will strike out the word "subscriptions" in line 4 of his amendment, and insert the words "the amount of their stockholdings," that will meet the situation. Then it refers back to the shareholders, not the subscribers to stock. That will cover the point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me suggest that if the Senator from North Dakota will so frame his amendment as to read "liability of shareholders of these banks shall be the same as that provided by law for members of the Federal reserve system," it will cover the point.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be the same thing.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that my amendment be modified by striking out the word "subscriptions" and adding the word "holdings."

Mr. President, I have nothing further to say in regard to the amendment. I am as anxious as anybody can possibly be to enact a law that will make it possible for American citizens to engage in foreign business, but I believe that it should be done in a safe and sane way; I believe it should be done in a way so that no American citizen shall suffer any loss from its transactions.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Senator from North Dakota, and thoroughly appreciate his desire to so protect this measure that, as he views it, it will protect the American public, or the investors in bonds or securities which might be issued by corporations organized under this act. I have endeavored in this very important legislation to meet the various suggestions of Senators, all desirous of perfecting the measure, and have, I believe in every case, so far as it has come to my attention, with this exception, been able to arrive at a mutual understanding with suggested amendments, and have either offered them to the bill or will when I have the opportunity to do so.

But, Mr. President, I do not want the real object of this bill destroyed by some amendment which will in its final analysis make the bill ineffectual. Let us just reason this situation briefly.

I thoroughly appreciate the analogy of national banks. The shareholders in national banks are liable to double their holdings, and so they should be. There is absolutely no question in my mind as to that. But I want to try to demonstrate the distinction—and it seems to me the very clear distinction—between a national bank handling the deposits of all classes of people, loaning the deposits on promissory notes and in other forms, as provided by law, and an investment banking corporation of this character not handling deposits, so far as we understand deposits in national banks, but handling deposits only as defined in the act where they relate directly to a transaction in which this banking corporation is endeavoring to finance the sale of some bill of goods abroad.

A corporation of this kind, as I think is generally clearly understood by Senators, will receive its income, in order to carry out these transactions, by issuing bonds on the securities they take from foreign purchasers of American products, issuing bonds in the ordinary way for sale to the American public or to the public anywhere. There is absolutely no compulsion that anyone should buy the bonds. They are simply offered to the public for sale, just as bonds are offered of any corporation that may be organized for any purpose. It is quite a different proposition from the function of a national bank, and I can not see how we can expect the average business man, who is principally anxious to have these banks incorporated, to invest in the stock of such a corporation if he is to be made liable for double his subscription in case of some bad investment the bank may make; and of course we are all subject to mistakes.

I feel that this is of such grave importance that we should at least permit some flexibility, that we should encourage the organization of these companies, which are going to be made up by the business men of our country.

I saw a statement in the papers yesterday by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that the cotton men of the South are preparing to-day to organize in order that they may come under an act of this kind, if possible, and consolidate their interests, so that they can give credit abroad and sell their goods and get paid for their goods, and this is the only way they can do it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment, if he will let me conclude the train of my thought.

So I want to be responsible, at least, or partially so, for the enactment of a law designed to meet this critical situation, designed to help stabilize exchange, designed to permit or help our business men sell their goods abroad and be paid for them rather than again compelling the Government to loan its credit in sending cash abroad and taxing the people to raise the cash. I want to encourage the public, the business men, bankers, and those interested in exportation to organize these corporations, and not feel that they are specially picked out to be doubly liable for some bond or debenture that might be issued in case the bank did make errors in financial judgment.

Senators must recall that every transaction of these banks is under the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board just as the transactions of national banks.

I feel that we can be justified in believing that they are going to watch the class of securities, and naturally a bank itself is not going to take over securities from foreign countries unless it feels that the value is adequate.

And again I come to the point that no one is compelled to buy the securities. They are not handling the people's money in the same degree that the national banks are, with deposits of everyone. If we are going to get results from this legislation, let us at least start it in a manner that will encourage investment, so that we may form the corporations and thus be in a position to finance our sales abroad.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator said that in certain cases this sort of a corporation would receive deposits. I will ask the Senator to explain that matter.

Mr. EDGE. Answering the query of the Senator from Maine, the act, on page 5, after enumerating the various privileges the corporation has, provides:

> To issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell exchange, coin, and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal security; to receive deposits; and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act.

This act in another place states very positively, now that we have cut out the word "principally," that corporations shall be organized for the purpose of engaging in international or foreign banking, and so forth. Now I want to read, as I did on Saturday, just answering that particular question, the regulation of the Federal Reserve Board on the question of receiving deposits, connected with corporations of this kind, which has already been published and is used in their relation to State corporations, some of which now exist. This is the regulation of the Federal Reserve Board on the question of receiving deposits for organizations of this class:

> It is clear that in order to avoid competition in the matter of receiving deposits with national banks and State banks, which do not enjoy the wide powers which you must necessarily possess in order to compete successfully in foreign countries, you should not be permitted in the United States to receive individual deposit accounts or domestic bank exchange or collection accounts. You will be permitted, however, to receive any deposit which is incidental to, or for the purpose of, carrying out transactions in foreign countries or dependencies of the United States where you have established agencies, branches, or business connections. Deposits of this character may be made by individuals, firms, corporations, or banks, whether foreign or domestic, and may be time deposits or on demand.

That is the regulation.

Mr. HALE. That would be something more in the nature of a loan?

Mr. EDGE. Deposits would simply be in the nature of a temporary transaction in connection with the bank buying or taking over foreign securities on this or that particular foreign transaction.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from New Jersey is calling attention now to what are supposed to be the rulings of the Federal Reserve Board. It is not a law; it is simply a ruling.

Mr. EDGE. That is true, but this act in many of its details leaves to the Federal Reserve Board the rules and regulations, and this is one of their established rules, not supposed to be, but a rule under which corporations are now operating.

Mr. McLEAN. The law itself confines the operation of these corporations to foreign countries. They are in no sense banks of deposit in this country.

Mr. GRONNA. The bill does not so provide, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McLEAN. I disagree most emphatically.

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to ask the Senator from New Jersey another question if he will permit me.

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the Senator is just as anxious as I am that these corporations shall be sound financial institutions.

Mr. EDGE. Absolutely.

Mr. GRONNA. Because they have the privilege of receiving deposits, and it gives them that privilege in the broadest terms. It simply recites that they shall be entitled to receive deposits. It does not say what kind of deposits. They are given the further privilege of issuing debenture bonds, something that no bank now has the right to do. Is it not for the benefit of those institutions to let the public know that there is a double liability behind them, and is it not necessary, in order to make a success out of these institutions and in order to have the confidence of the public, the public should know there is a safe responsibility behind those debenture bonds?

Mr. EDGE. In answer to the Senator from North Dakota I would be entirely satisfied to accept his suggestion and amendment if I did not feel that it would discourage the organization of these banks. I may say as a comparison that unquestionably it would to some extent increase the value of the bonds on the market, but to-day the public are purchasing bonds by the millions of dollars, representing all classes of corporations, yet, of course, they have absolutely no guaranty except the capital stock of the corporations.

May I read right here the view of Gov. Harding on this question? I realized the question would be raised and asked him to give me a statement as from his experience as governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and here is what he said:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD, OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, September 4, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of the 2d instant inclosing a draft of proposed amendments to Senate bill 2472, and hand you herewith a memorandum from the board's general counsel on the subject of these amendments. I concur in the views expressed, except as to the amendment marked "C," which provides for shareholders' double liability.

I think that a double liability of shareholders in a corporation engaged principally in financing export trade is unnecessary and undesirable. I presume it was suggested because of its supposed analogy to national banks, the stockholders of which have a statutory double liability. There is, however, I think, an essential distinction. The double liability of stockholders of national banks is for the protection of depositors who have no control whatever over the lending operations of the national banks, nor are they given an opportunity of ascertaining the condition of a national bank except so far as it is furnished by the statements which are published periodically in response to a call from the Comptroller of the Currency. These statements do not, as a rule, give the depositor any idea of the worth of the loans and investments of the bank.

I understand that the laws of the State of Ohio provide for double liability of stockholders in all corporations, but I believe that in most of the other States the laws do not provide for such additional liability. The banks which have already been organized under State laws to do a foreign banking business have charters from States which do not require a double liability, and neither these institutions nor the ones which would be organized under Senate bill 2472 would receive deposits except under rules to be established by the Federal Reserve Board, which already has ruled that such deposits shall be incidental to and clearly in connection with the foreign business transacted.

The rule I have just read.

It seems to me, therefore, that there is no occasion to provide for double liability for the protection of depositors.

The obligations which corporations organized under S. 2472 would sell to the public would be specifically secured by the pledge of certain assets of the corporation, a description of which would be furnished the prospective investor, whose position would be totally different from that of a depositor in a national bank, and who would have every opportunity of investigating the soundness of the obligation offered to him and the security to it before he parts with his money.

State banks are authorized under the laws of a good many States to invest in stock of other corporations, and a bill has already passed both the House and the Senate to authorize national banks to invest not exceeding 5 per cent of their capital and surplus in stock of corporations principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States. No provision is made in this bill for double liability, and in any event I do not believe that the directors of a bank would care to invest in a stock having that liability, no matter how remote the contingency might be of an assessment being made. I think, therefore, that it would be unfortunate if this amendment should be insisted upon.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM P. G. HARDING,
Governor.

Hon. WALTER E. EDGE,
United States Senate.

I think that states the situation as thoroughly as it can be stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not understand why the Senator from New Jersey objects to the amendment. In the first place, I want to say that there are no stockholders of State banks in the East or West that I know of that are not under a double liability. There may be some States in the South that do not require it, but in every State in the North, in the States where the great bulk of the commerce of the United States is transacted, it will be found that stockholders have imposed upon them a double liability. If I were going to invest in any bank that might be organized under this act, I certainly would not ask any different treatment than if I were going to invest in any national bank or in any State bank.

We ought to look at the bill as it is before us and pass judgment upon it as to what effect it is going to have upon not only those interested in the stock but those who are to do business with the banks organized under its provisions. There are not the restrictions in the bill as to the loaning of money that there are with the national or State banks of the country.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that each corporation organized under this bill, if it becomes a law, is given authority to borrow and to lend money on real and personal property and securities. There is no limit to the amount. Who does not know that many of the failures of the banks of this country, particularly in State banks, have come from lending excessive amounts upon real estate? The national banking acts would not until recently allow the loaning of any part of their deposits or their capital upon real estate. I think that it was a very wise provision in the banking laws of our country.

I want to call attention to the wide powers given under this bill:

To purchase, sell, discount, and negotiate notes, drafts, checks, bills of exchange, acceptances, including bankers' acceptances, cable transfers, and other evidences of indebtedness; to purchase and sell securities, including the obligations of the United States or of any State thereof; to accept bills or drafts drawn upon it, subject to such limitations and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may impose; to issue letters of credit; to purchase and sell exchange, coin, and bullion; to borrow and to lend money on real or personal securities; to receive deposits; and generally to exercise such powers as are incidental to the powers conferred by this act—

Then it proceeds to give power to this bank—

as may be usual in connection with the transaction of the business of banking or other financial operations in the countries, colonies, dependencies, or possessions in which it shall transact business.

There is no limitation whatever, and it seems to me we are going too far when we throw no protection around the depositors and the men who do business with such banks.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Is it not a fact that the reason for the double liability now imposed upon banks results from the fact that the banks solicit and receive deposits from those in the community who in the nature of affairs know nothing about the banks? They have nothing to get from the banks to whom they intrust their money, and therefore the law provides that where a bank is incorporated for the benefit of the general community there shall be a double liability. Where every one of its depositors is as familiar with its business and with the method of the transactions as the directors are themselves, where its depositors are drawn only from the great exporters and importers of the country, does not every reason for the double liability vanish in connection with this bank?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the statement were absolutely correct that every depositor knew just as much about the business as the directors of the institution will know there would be some reason for not requiring a double liability, but not reason enough to justify changing of the system that has been in vogue for many years in this country and in nearly every other country that the stockholders have a double liability in order to protect the depositors. That is why the double liability is imposed, and I want never to see the time come when that double liability will not be imposed upon the stockholders of all banks organized in the United States.

Mr. President, I say in this connection, if we take away the double liability of the stockholders of the national banks or of the State banks men without any financial standing would have a better chance to impose upon innocent depositors, as no question would be raised as to the liability of the stockholders. Inducements by way of larger rates of interest on daily balances or upon savings accounts will be freely offered in such cases, and the stockholders would not watch the management as closely as if a double liability was in force. When the law enforces upon a stockholder a double liability, the stockholder then has a greater interest in seeing that the men who manage the affairs of the bank will look out for the interests of the stockholders as well as the interests of the depositors.

Mr. President, the Senator says that under this bill these banks are authorized to issue bonds. I do not know what provision of the bill authorizes the issuing of bonds by the banks. They have a perfect right and are authorized under the bill to purchase bonds, to sell bonds, to deal in bonds, but there is no provision in the bill which I can find that authorizes them to issue bonds.

If there is such a provision we should strike it from the bill. No banking institution ought to be authorized by Congress to issue long-term bonds of its own and then use that money in its business. For the life of me I can not see why there is objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I can not see why the depositors and those who do business with the bank are not entitled to as much protection as possible, and one way we can give them that protection is to impose upon the stockholder a double liability.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey thinks that the stockholders would object to the insertion of this provision in the bill, and he does not think the stock can so readily be sold with the provision inserted as if it were not included in the bill. I can not conceive of any institution authorized under this bill stating to its customers that the stockholders are not willing to assume a double liability, as is usual in all banking institutions.

Under this bill broader powers are given to the proposed banks than are given to the national banks of the country. We limit national banks and also State banks, with the exception of a few in the South, as to the amount of loans they may make upon real estate, and all national banks and practically every State bank, as I am informed, are limited in amount of loans which they may make to any one concern or individual. In this case, however, there is no limit whatever; in fact, the banks organized under the bill could loan all their capital stock, all their reserves, and all their deposits to one concern. I do not say they will do it; I have no reason to think they will do it; nor under the provisions of the bill would they be allowed to do it by the Federal Reserve Board; but, Mr. President, when we are passing legislation let us at least guard it where we know it needs to be guarded.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has just adverted to the point to which I was going to call his attention, that partially, at least, all acts of such corporations are reviewable and controllable under the jurisdiction of the Federal Reserve Board. I am sure, however, the Senator appreciates that in organizing a corporation of this character, with its more or less new responsibilities, it is absolutely necessary in starting it to permit of some flexibility. Otherwise we might just as well not attempt to pass the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that under this bill there is all the flexibility that anyone could ever think of and altogether too much.

Mr. EDGE. They are subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I recognize, however, Mr. President, that this bill could be drawn on one page; I recognize that we could in one sentence or in one paragraph give all the authority to these banks possible, and say that their operation shall be under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board prescribe; but if we are going to enumerate their powers, and if we are going to insert in the bill itself restrictions on the banks, let us take a little care; let us at least tell these banks what Congress intends that they shall do, and also that Congress intends that there shall be some limitation placed upon them.

I have confidence in the officials of the Federal Reserve Board; I do not think they will allow banks to run wild; but I say that with reports made quarterly—and that may be the requirement imposed by the Federal Reserve Board—transactions could be entered into and contracts could be closed that would utterly destroy the financial standing of a bank and, perhaps, bring utter ruin to it. It is for that reason that I ask the Senator from New Jersey to accept the pending amendment, for it is a restriction and one that every stockholder ought to be perfectly willing to assume. I know if I invest in a bank—I do not care at what price the stock may be—if I buy a share or 10 shares of bank stock, I buy with the distinct understanding that I am liable for the amount of the face value of that stock over and above what I pay for it. I think every man should take that position, not only as to State banks and national banks but also in reference to the banks which we are proposing to create under this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish briefly to support the statement just made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the statement of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], having charge of the bill, and have no doubt of the soundness of the reasons which he advances for this proposed exception, but those reasons seem to me to support rather than to weaken the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], for if it is true that the business of the bank is different, so different, indeed, as to place it in a class by itself and relieve it from the ordinary responsibilities which may attach to the transaction of the business of an ordinary banking concern, then there is less liability to the stockholder and less reason for his objecting to making the requirement the same as that which the law provides for other systems of banking. I think, however, it is a fact of now recognized general importance that safeguards required by law on behalf of the depositor can not be made too effective. I have always believed in the system of guaranty of deposits, and I am satisfied that where the system has been properly guarded its operation justifies the attitude of those who have advocated such a system. Banks sometimes speculate; they sometimes, with the best of intentions, make bad investments, however perfect the system may be under which they operate; and it is those contingencies, just as it is the occasional criminal in society, which require the enactment of general laws for the protection of the innocent.

This is a business somewhat unique with us in banking circles, and the very fact that among other things it is novel would seem to me to justify the continuance instead of the weakening of those safeguards which experience has taught us are so necessary for the protection of those who do business with and who put their confidence in banks.

Moreover, Mr. President, I can readily understand how, if this bill should be enacted without the amendment and should operate successfully, it would easily become the basis for an application to amend our Federal banking act so as to decrease the present liability of the shareholder and make it conform with the liability of the shareholders of the proposed new class of banks. It might be very plausibly argued that inasmuch as experience has shown that the limit of liability is all the protection the public needs, the absolute liability now required is unnecessary and burdensome. There are many of us who might be convinced by such an argument, but in any event it is the establishment of a precedent, the possibility of acting upon which might lead to bad consequences.

I have never been reconciled to the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918, which removes the restrictions of the Clayton Act from certain corporations engaged in the export business. The practical effect of these exemptions, it seems to me, will be to neutralize them in their application to domestic business.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. THOMAS. It is inevitable that the surplus which we export fixes the price of the articles entering into domestic consumption. It is the surplus of wheat sold in Liverpool that fixes the domestic price of wheat in normal times; and, if those engaged in exporting wheat to Liverpool are exempt from the requirements of the Clayton Act, then very naturally it must follow that that exemption will find expression in the domestic business that attaches to the same commodity. I do not remember whether I was present when the export-trade bill was enacted, but my recollection is that it passed without a roll call. I opposed the principle of it and the bill itself in the Committee on Finance and protested against it then, and greatly fear that the objections which presented themselves to my mind against them will be verified by the operation of the act itself. Let us not now duplicate that by fixing this limited liability upon banking institutions, however much they may apparently need it, because if they are as profitable as we have reason to believe they will be they will attract capital notwithstanding the fact that the liability of the shareholder is the same as but no greater than a similar liability upon the same investment in a bank belonging to the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, if it would not be well for him to yield this point, for while what he says is true, I think what is said on the other side is also true, that the bonds which may be issued would have some further stability if they did have the backing of a double liability. The only point about it was—and I think that was the conception in drawing the bill—that it might be difficult to attract capital; but I do not think that capital will be really deterred by the double liability, because the bonds that are going to be issued will be based upon securities that are absolutely sound and good, so that they would not be in any danger from a double liability whatever. Therefore, I do not think there is enough to quarrel over it one way or the other, and I wanted to suggest to the Senator that delay might be obviated by acquiescence.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, before the Senator in charge of the bill agrees to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma and withdraw his opposition to the amendment, I should like in a word to recall to the Senate the precise question which I believe is before the Senate and involved in this discussion.

It is admitted that the proposed banks will be on a different plane entirely from the ordinary banks of deposit in the United States. The law itself limits their operation to foreign countries. The new banks will not accept deposits over their counters; and when you eliminate that privilege you withdraw from the discussion every reason upon which is based the double liability requirement as applied to other banks. With that in view, it seems to me it is unreasonable to place the double liability upon these banks, because they are not organized for the purpose of doing business in this country; they are organized for the purpose of assisting exportations and doing business in foreign countries. There would be just as much justice, for instance, in requiring that a stockholder in a life-insurance company or a building and loan association or a fire-insurance company or a bond and mortgage company should be doubly liable on his stock as to require a double liability on stockholders in the case of the corporations proposed to be created under this bill, because, as I have said and as was so well put by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], they are not permitted to do a deposit or general banking business in this country. The law limits their operations to foreign countries.

Mr. President, I think my bump of caution is fairly large, and I would not for a moment oppose double liability as applied to these institutions if I thought they were to compete with American banks which do a deposit business, and for which that double liability is required; but they do not, and one thing is certain, unless we put these institutions upon a par with other like institutions in other countries that may be doing a similar line of business, we might just as well defeat this legislation altogether. If we impose this double liability upon these institutions without sound justification, if we discriminate against them, I doubt very much whether any of these corporations can be organized.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in his discussion of this bill, seems to assume that they are going to do business in this country. If we admit that their operations are to be confined to foreign countries—and clearly the law so provides—it must be clear to every Senator that these corporations must have the same privileges that are accorded to other similar corporations in other countries, or they can not compete for an instant; and that is the point upon which the governor of the Federal Reserve Board puts such stress. It seems to me that he is entirely justified.

Assume that an English corporation is doing business in France, or a Japanese corporation is doing business in France. Unless this American institution has all the privileges that are accorded to those which come from other countries it can not compete. That, I assume, is why the language was used in this bill—that they were to have all the privileges usually accorded to like institutions doing business in foreign countries.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Let us suppose that the cotton man exports a cargo of cotton. A bill of lading is drawn. That bill of lading would necessarily pass through these corporations, would it not?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Is not that exactly the same as a deposit? The money would come back to this corporation, and if the corporation failed what would become of the cotton producer?

Mr. McLEAN. In the ordinary transaction of business a sale of cotton under the terms suggested by the Senator from North Dakota would be a short-time obligation, probably, and absolutely secure.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. The Senator knows that these corporations are organized for the purpose of extending credit.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. And the cotton man expects to get his money from these people, whether the foreign buyer pays or not.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me say to the Senator that deposits will be received by these corporations in the largest of volume. If not, then they are absolutely not necessary and will be of no value to the people of this country.

Mr. McLEAN. They will receive deposits, and those deposits will be of the character described by the Senator from North Dakota, and if they are confined to that class of deposits I can see no special reason for requiring a double liability on the part of the stockholders. Those bills are secured by goods in transit, and it is nothing more nor less than business that is carried on by private institutions.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McLEAN. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I want to suggest to the Senator that receiving deposits is one form of receiving credits from the people; but when you sell them debenture bonds and promise to pay those bonds when they are due it is making a promise to the people that in these banks will grow into very large sums.

The matter turns merely upon a question of policy. I have no doubt in the world that these banks, which will be extending credit based on French bonds and on the promises of French cotton-spinning syndicates and upon French organizations of various kinds in commercial and industrial life, will be perfectly sound and will be very profitable; and the question turns upon the double liability, not, I think, so much to secure these loans that are being made, although it would serve that end. The Senator from Connecticut is opposing it because he thinks capital will not easily flow into these institutions. Senators opposing him are not content for fear that the loan will not be secure when the debentures are issued; but I am very sure that capital will flow into the institutions, because the promises of reward are large and because the securities are absolutely abundant and perfectly sound.

I think, therefore, that no harm can be done by yielding to the suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota in this amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the necessity of doing something of the kind proposed by the pending bill.

A great many plans have been suggested, as the Members of this body know, all of them attempts to remedy the exchange situation, which is very sensitive at the present time. I have not been so certain that the pending measure would meet the situation as effectively as it ought to. I have felt that it was the only measure that was safe that had been brought to the attention of the committee and, of course, it is for the Senate to say whether these corporations shall be put under all the restrictions that apply to domestic institutions. My own belief has been that under the circumstances it would be advisable to give them all the leeway that was safe, in order that capital might be invited rather than repelled. If these institutions repel capital instead of inviting it, they will be of no value whatever in the present crisis abroad.

I want to call to the attention of the Senate in this connection a statement made by the President of the United States on September 5, in a speech which he delivered in St. Louis:

> I suppose that most of you realize that it is going to be very difficult for the other nations that were engaged in this war to get financially on their feet again. I dare say you read the other day the statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover's opinion—an opinion which I always greatly respect—that it will be necessary for the United States immediately to advance four or five billion dollars for the rehabilitation of credit and industry on the other side of the water; and I must say to you that I learned nothing in Paris which would lead me to doubt that conclusion, and I think the statement of the sum is a reasonable and conservative statement.

Mr. President, I regret that the Chief Executive was not more specific. I regret that he did not let his hearers know just how this four or five billions of dollars is to be raised immediately. I think it would have been a good plan if he had indicated whether it was to come from the Treasury of the United States or from private capital, because, if this statement is correct, if we must raise and send abroad four or five billions of dollars immediately, I hardly think the bill under consideration will meet that situation; but I confess I have been rather more optimistic. I have felt that if the political situation in Europe remains stable and the people of Europe retain their economic sanity, the economic law of supply and demand will very soon begin to tell upon the rate of exchange and that it would not be necessary for the Government to extend any more assistance to these countries.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the other day called attention to the enormous balance of trade that had been running against them during the last 5 or 6 years. The Senator, of course, knows that the peak of that trade was reached in June; that in July our exports fell off materially and the imports increased materially. The official figures for the foreign trade of the United States in the month of July showed that exports were about $750,000,000, or $350,000,000 under the phenomenal figures of June, while imports of $345,000,000 were the largest for any month on record—nearly $50,000,000 above those of June and $100,000,000 above those of July, 1918. It seems to me that this indicates that the European countries understand the situation, and that the exchange, although it works against them when they buy of us, works in their favor when they sell to us. I take it that a cotton manufacturer in England can purchase his raw material in this country and pay the premium on the gold with which he must buy his cotton, and take the cotton to Europe and manufacture it, and, because of the great increase in the value of the manufactured goods, if he can sell them in this country, he more than recoups his original loss on the rate of exchange.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator knows that our exportations for the months of July and August would have been a great deal more if the foreign countries could have paid for the goods that were already made for them and waiting for exportation. I wish to say to the Senator, from all the information I can get, that every warehouse available at the ports of entry is bursting with goods ready for exportation, but they can not be exported because of the fact that the buyers in foreign countries have not the money to pay for them and no way to arrange for it, and they can not afford to have them go with the exchange running so heavily against them.

Mr. McLEAN. That is correct. My feeling has been that although the industrial future of Europe is very intimately allied with and dependent upon its political conditions, if they retain their economic sanity, the time would come when the credits necessary to pay for these goods might be advanced under the operation of some such bill as we are considering now, and if that were true there would be every reason to give to these Americans who are willing to risk their capital in this adventure all the rights that individuals from other countries would be accorded by their governments, and that, in my opinion, is just about what this bill does as reported by the committee.

Mr. President, we all know that political and social conditions in Europe are very sensitive at the present time. Europe has been made safe for democracy, and Europe must now learn what the word means. Democracy is nothing in the world but a governmental mill, and if they put anarchy and socialism into the hopper they will take anarchy and socialism home in the bag, and it is a little uncertain just now what conclusions they will reach in this regard in some very important sections of Europe. We hope for the best, but if anything of that kind should happen, then we must meet a very unpleasant situation at home, because this enormous total of surplus products which we are selling abroad would have to be disposed of at home, and while none of us enjoy the high cost of living we all know that the high cost of living is not nearly as objectionable as the low cost of not living. The worst times that this country has experienced in my recollection were when the price of wheat ranged from 50 to 60 cents a bushel, and while we are all up in this balloon of too high prices, it seems to me advisable, if possible, to reach the ground on a general decline rather than blow the balloon up and walk back; and for that reason I think it is the duty of Congress under the circumstances to go further perhaps than some of our ultra technical friends seem inclined to go here this morning in granting to these corporations the privilege of extending their credits to our hard-pressed neighbors abroad.

For that reason, although my bump of caution I believe is as large as that of any Member of this body, I have been willing under the circumstances that these corporations should have accorded to them every consideration that like corporations have in other countries, and I think that the objection of Senators to the provisions of this bill limiting the responsibility of the shareholders to the single liability is unreasonable under the circumstances. I think it will tend to discourage the organization of these companies, and if the bill, if passed, becomes inoperative, then in sheer self-defense we may be compelled to take from the Treasury of the United States four or five billions of dollars, as the President says, in order to save the ten billions that they are already owing us. I do not think that is a pleasant prospect, and so under all the circumstances I feel that the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Utah are hypercritical in their criticisms of this bill. I think they are borrowing trouble when they assume that these institutions are to do a banking business in this country such as under our laws justly and fairly require a double responsibility on the part of stockholders. I think we should pass this bill without the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota if we expect that these corporations are to meet this very sensitive situation to the extent which I think is necessary if the exchange situation is to be remedied.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I think our friends look on this too much as a banking bill. It is what we need in our country as an export measure. We have millions and millions of pounds of cotton that we are prepared to export if we knew to whom to send it in order to make a safe sale. We would be glad to extend time. The warehouses are full, the banks are overloaded with all kinds of loans, and we would be glad if we had a company to carry the cotton to the foreign market and to take their securities, and we would be glad to buy those securities and extend time on them and help the world to get safe and get back to work. I think our friends are unnecessarily alarmed about the liability. We need to encourage this business, and need to encourage it right now. I hope the bill will pass, and that everything consistent with liberality will be provided. I believe the provisions are entirely ample for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was, on page 8, line 24, before the word "corporation," to insert the words "No such," so as to make the sentence read:

No such corporation, however, shall become a member of any Federal reserve bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I move to strike out, on page 6, beginning with line 6:

The provisions of section 7 of the act approved October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," shall not apply to corporations or to officers, directors, or employees of corporations organized under this section.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I would like to say just a word. Of course, it is a very important amendment. I am going to acquiesce in the amendment, and I have done so after very careful consideration of its effect on the bill.

I do not agree with all that has been said in previous discussions as to the waiving of the so-called Sherman Act and its effect on this measure. But, on the other hand, this is a banking corporation, it is limited to that business by amendments already adopted, and I do not feel at all that the elimination of that waiver will in any way affect the activities of the corporations to be formed. Therefore I will support the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill:

Every banking corporation authorized to do foreign banking business under the provisions of this section shall, for the purpose of taxation, make reports to the Federal Reserve Board and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at such times and in such form as they may require, including a true report of the names of the actual stockholders in such corporations, and the amount of stock held by each, and all such corporations organized and transacting business under the provisions of this section shall be taxed the same as member banks of the Federal reserve system.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on page 7, line 23, after the word "purposes," I move to insert "as amended"; and in the same line, as a part of the same amendment, after the word "shall," I move to strike out the word "not," so that as proposed to be amended it would read, beginning with the sentence on line 20 of the same page:

The provisions of section 8 of the act approved October 15, 1914, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," as amended, shall be construed to apply to the directors, other officers, agents, or employees of corporations organized under the provisions of this section.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I have no objection to the language he proposes, but I have prepared an amendment covering the same section. All that is desired is the privilege of a director now a director in a member bank by permission of the Federal Reserve Board to become a director of such a corporation, and that is the law to-day. So if the Senator desires to put it in that language he may do so. I was simply going to insert this language:

The directors elected by the corporations organized hereunder shall be subject to the laws to which directors of member banks of the Federal Reserve System are subject.

It is exactly the same thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the amendment which I have offered accomplishes that purpose.

Mr. EDGE. It accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And it does so with the change of only two or three words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when I was discussing the bill yesterday I called attention to the provision on page 5, line 5, following the word "act." At that time I announced that I thought all of the balance of line 5 and lines 6, 7, and 8 should be stricken from the bill.

The Senator having the bill in charge is, I understand, perfectly willing to accept an amendment to clarify the language to a certain extent, and I am therefore going to offer the amendment. Instead of asking that the whole of the lines mentioned by me be stricken out, I merely move to amend by inserting, after the word "usual" in line 5, on page 5, the following:

In the determination of the Federal Reserve Board.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I further move to amend by inserting after the word "business," in line 8, on page 5, the following:

And not inconsistent with the powers specifically granted herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think the passage of this bill is a very important matter for our Government. I think the securities that will be obtained by these banks will be perfectly sound and based upon industrial syndicates. They will be backed by bonds of France, Italy, Great Britain, and Belgium.

I was struck this morning to see an advertisement of a New York company inviting the American public to invest in this sort of securities, in which they pointed out that the Italian lire are down 90 per cent, that French francs are down 60 per cent, that Belgian francs are down 65 per cent, and English pounds are down 15 per cent. I pause merely to say that last year on orders American gold dollars were sold and bought in Barcelona, Spain, at 66 cents, for the reason that American credits were not available for sale in Spain at a time when they were needed, and now when these foreign credits are much needed here we see the same thing occurring. There is no doubt about the solvency of Italy, Belgium, France, or Great Britain, any more than there is a question of the solvency of the United States. Their physical resources remain, their people remain, their machinery and improved energies due to this war are all there, and the indebtedness which the Governments owe is held by their own people. It does not affect the solvency of the world to issue two hundred billions of government debt since the citizens of the world hold every dollar of that debt. It is a question of distribution; that is what it amounts to; and the world will come to a time when it will cause a proper redistribution where the original distribution has gone unfairly and to great excess into a few hands.

I ask permission to put that advertisement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because Members of the Senate ought to see what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"FOREIGN TRADE AND FOREIGN INVESTMENTS.

"Many of the large banking institutions in the United States have created foreign departments and have sent representatives abroad in order to obtain first-hand information and to establish connections.

"However, the expansion of our export business must rely in large measure on the foreign exchange situation. The following figures indicate how important this situation is:

"Italian lire are down 90 per cent.
"French francs are down 60 per cent.

"Such a situation not only imposes a great burden on the European nations, but also reacts to disadvantage of Americans, as it interferes very seriously with development of our export trade.

"There are four ways to improve the foreign exchange situation:

"(a) Shipment of gold to this country.
"(b) Shipment of goods to this country.
"(c) Extension of long-term dollar credits.
"(d) Purchase of foreign securities.

"The first is impossible, and besides we do not need or want more gold.

"The second is slowly readjusting itself.

"The third is practicable, but is a banking transaction.

"The fourth is an investment proposition with unusually attractive features, namely:

"(a) A chance for the enhancement of the principal and interest involved.

"(b) Helping our allies and our best customers.

"(c) Increasing our exports, and thereby helping in the development of our own industries.

"(d) Improving our foreign and domestic investments by supporting the foreign exchange situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the situation as to our gold dollar in Spain referred to by the Senator was easily corrected by this Government, and I know the Government sold to Spain, or the institutions of Spain, between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 of short-time certificates.

Mr. OWEN. All in the world that is necessary is to transfer credit.

Mr. SMOOT. The credit was transferred and the value of the gold dollar immediately rose.

Mr. OWEN. European people are trying to protect themselves now by cutting off the shipping of luxuries there. There is an interesting dispatch from London to that effect now, in which it is said:

A movement has been started, backed mostly by British manufacturers, to bring pressure upon the board of trade to forbid the importation of American pianos, phonographs, sewing machines, motor vehicles, and other luxuries. It is contended that British buying of such articles and others not in the list of necessities is one of the principal causes of the low rate of exchange.

Of course that is measurably true, and I think America ought not to be shipping luxuries to Europe when they are so sadly in need of raw materials and machinery.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an embargo now placed on certain luxuries by England. I have a list of them in my office, and it is really interesting to read just what England has done in relation to placing an embargo upon certain classes of goods that are not absolutely necessary for the people's comfort.

Mr. OWEN. The French and Italians have similar embargoes exercised through their licensing boards. I think it is a great mistake for the Federal Reserve Board to take the position that we ought to cut off our exports generally. I do not know that they go so far as that, and yet they have in a recent bulletin declared that they could adjust our exchange by cutting off exports. Of course that is true, but it is a remedy which is exceedingly expensive to the United States and paralyzing to our foreign commerce. If you paralyze our commerce, it is almost like blighting the growth of a plant; it is not easy to restore it; and the bankers of New York, who are very familiar with questions of this sort, have expressed very active dissent over that.

I ask permission to place in the RECORD the criticism of the banks on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BANKERS CRITICIZE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD'S SUGGESTION FOR REDUCTION OF EXPORTS.

"Suggestion by the Federal Reserve Board, in a statement published yesterday, that the natural method to correct unfavorable foreign-exchange rates would be to reduce American exports caused astonishment in international banking circles here, where a great deal of thought has been given to the problem. The board in its statement said:

"'The state of the foreign exchanges merely reflects the state of international trade. The correction of the exchange situation so much complained of by those who look at the matter from the exclusive standpoint of the export interest will therefore only find its natural and permanent solution through a reduction of our exports and an increase of our imports until they reach a point of approximate equilibrium.'

"Local bankers took direct issue with the Federal Reserve Board on the question. One important banker who has studied the foreign trade problem from every angle said that he could not conceive of a more unfortunate outcome of the existing derangement of the international money market than the loss of American foreign trade.

"'What we should do is to expand our exports, not reduce them,' this banker observed. 'The remedy for depreciated foreign currency can be found in extension of foreign credits. The United States has most unusual opportunity to extend its export business. It should seize this opportunity and not cast it aside, as suggested by the Federal Reserve Board.'

"Another banker of international reputation said that he could not agree with the Federal Reserve Board that export business should be curtailed.

"'Experience has shown,' said this banker, 'that foreign trade once lost is never regained. There is no reason for doubting that our experience would be that of other nations in this respect.'

"This banker went on to say that the United States is actually losing its foreign trade 'in big chunks.' He said the situation is a very serious one, but that it is not too late to remedy it if Washington only awakes to the truth of the matter and enacts necessary legislation.

"'The so-called Davison plan for extending foreign credits offers an excellent solution of the foreign-exchange problem,' he continued. 'Were it put into effect, we would be able to expand our foreign business instead of reducing it and at the same time the foreign-exchange situation would be remedied.'

"This banker estimated that the volume of foreign credits required to rectify foreign exchange is not nearly as large as some estimates have made it. He calculated that a billion dollars, and possibly half a billion dollars, would suffice.

"But before the Davison plan can be realized legislation should be enacted by Congress, he declared, to make the plan effective. The Edge bill, providing for federally incorporated companies to engage in foreign business and permitting members of the Federal Reserve System to invest in the stocks of such companies, he said, is one piece of legislation necessary to the success of the plan. Another is amendment of the War Finance Corporation act, whereby banks would be relieved of the responsibility of indorsing the paper of exporters which borrow funds from the War Finance Corporation.

"'Congress could enact the required legislation in a week,' went on this banker. 'The idea that the peace treaty must be ratified before anything can be done toward extending foreign credits is erroneous. The two have no bearing on each other. If the administration paused in its fight for the peace treaty sufficiently long to give its public indorsement and moral support to a foreign credit plan and to ask the enactment of the legislation suggested, we soon would find it possible to rectify the foreign-exchange situation without loss of trade.'

"Bankers compared American delay with the enterprise of Great Britain. The British Government is losing no time in seizing its foreign trade opportunities. It lately authorized extension of huge credits to semisolvent countries. In other ways it has encouraged British manufacturers to enlarge their business abroad."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to occupy the time of the Senate for only a few moments. Before I proceed I wish to have the article read which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SENATORS URGED TO PASS FOREIGN FINANCING BILL—INSISTENT DEMANDS FOR ADOPTION EXPECTED TO RUSH MEASURE THROUGH—EDGE WILL ASK SENATE TO TAKE UP HIS BILL SOON AFTER PROHIBITION-ENFORCEMENT LAW IS OUT OF WAY—GRONNA CONTINUES OBJECTION TO GRANTING UNANIMOUS CONSENT FOR ACTION.

"WASHINGTON, August 28.

"Action on the Edge foreign financing bill now is planned in the Senate for next week.

"Senator EDGE will ask that the bill be considered immediately after the disposal of prohibition legislation. The prohibition bill is scheduled to come up after action is taken on the Smoot oil-land leasing bill, which has been under discussion for the past week. In case more than two or three days are required for consideration of the prohibition bill, action on the Edge measure may be deferred until the following week.

"Republican leaders have agreed that the bill should come up at that time. In case Senator GRONNA, of North Dakota, continues to refuse to join in a unanimous-consent agreement it will be necessary for Senator EDGE to move that it be taken up. No difficulty is anticipated in putting through the motion in view of the fact that the cooperation of the majority party leaders is assured.

"The pressure upon Senators for the passage of the bill is becoming so insistent that they are expected to put it through with comparatively little discussion when they once get an opportunity. Senator GRONNA is the only one who has announced his intention to speak against it.

"Although the bill was introduced some time ago in the House by Representative ACKERMAN, of New Jersey, no hearings will be held upon it until it has been passed by the Senate."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe that every Member of this body is just as honest and just as earnest in his desire to pass legislation beneficial to the public as I am. I did not have the article read for any purpose whatever except to call attention to the fact that those who inspired the article were mistaken in making their guess. It must be evident now that the bill has literally been torn to pieces, and that the membership of this body has assisted in improving it and have made it a much better bill than it was.

Mr. President, I do not say that this bill is now perfect, but surely it is a much better measure than it was when it came from the committee or than it was when it was proposed and sent to the committee.

Let me say that it is great satisfaction to me as an humble member of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, who stood alone and criticized the measure, that men, and I am not mentioning them by name, for the record shows for itself who the men are, who have spoken against some of the provisions of the bill, men on both sides of the Chamber, men whose honesty and integrity will not be questioned have by their votes and their able arguments made this bill what it is. I am glad to know, Mr. President, that it can not be said that those giants in finance over in Wall Street have a grip upon the throats of the Members of this body. It will have a wholesome effect for the people of this country to know that the Senate of the United States is legislating in accordance with its own views, and not in accordance with the views of the great men who have financial resources, who have the power and ability to control, as they want to, not only the finances of the United States but of every country of Europe, that that class of men can not dictate or control the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, some of these people have undertaken recently not only to control the financial affairs of this country but have gone much further than that and seem to think they should control our foreign policy. They seem to have been favored and to have known more than the Senate of the United States seemed to be entitled to know; they have carried in their pockets information that nobody outside of the membership of this body was entitled to have. But I thank God that the Members of this body have seen fit to legislate in accordance with their own wisdom and their own views.

Mr. President, there is much that I could say upon this subject, but I know that the Senator who has this bill in charge is very anxious that it shall be disposed of. He has been very courteous to all of us, and I will close simply by saying that I am glad to have been able in a small way to assist in amending the measure, for I believe that it would ultimately have led to disaster had its provisions not been changed. When I say that it is not for the purpose of criticizing anyone, whether he was in favor of the bill as reported or not, but simply to express the idea that there has been an honest difference of opinion. I know that this is a very different measure now from what it was when reported out of the committee. It will be wholesome and beneficial not only to those who are going to engage in this great enterprise but to the people of the United States and to the people of Europe.

Let me say we have a responsibility to meet and perform in helping to build up the industries of the devastated countries of Europe. We can not do it by robbing them; we can not do it by placing our hands upon their throats. It must be done in an honest, honorable, and legitimate way; and when we give, as we would do according to the provisions of the original bill, almost unlimited powers and unlimited possibilities for people of great wealth to fasten themselves with debt obligations not upon this country alone but upon the people of Europe who have gone through this terrible and cruel war, it is our duty to see to it not to give to these corporations, which are at least quasi public-service corporations, great opportunities and this great power, but exercise complete control over them, so that at least they shall act in an honorable way and shall account for their actions to the responsible authorities of this Government.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer one other amendment, and it is my understanding, when agreed to, that will complete all pending amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that on page 7 a committee amendment was passed over and has not yet been disposed of. However, the Secretary will state the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 23, after the word "corporations," it is proposed to strike out the word "however" and the commas preceding and following that word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. I now ask that the committee amendment referred to by the Chair as having been passed over be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the committee amendment which has been passed over.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment on page 7, which was passed over was, in line 15, after the word "corporation," where the committee reported to insert the words "the controlling interest in which is owned by citizens of the United States."

Mr. EDGE. I ask that the amendment may be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask what has been done with regard to the provision beginning in line 20, on page 7? Has there been any amendment made to that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the words "or of a State thereof," in line 20, have been stricken out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is still open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before the bill is passed I simply wish to state that I sincerely trust that in the passage of this measure the Senate of the United States have contributed something material to the benefit and the welfare of the business interests of the United States and in aid of the rehabilitation of the stricken countries of Europe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the President, speaking last week in the State of Missouri, presented to the people of the State, in regard to the league of nations, an issue which does not exist.

The issue before the American people in connection with the treaty of peace and the covenant of the league of nations is not, as the President indicates, a choice between acceptance or rejection of the treaty. We are not necessarily called upon to choose between acceptance of the treaty precisely as it is written or, failing thus to accept it, to face absolute rejection of the entire negotiations. I am frank to say for myself if I were forced to make that choice I should vote against the treaty as it now stands.

I have no sympathy with proposed changes, under whatever name they may be called, which are offered mainly in the desire and with the intention to kill the treaty or to so complicate the situation as to destroy or endanger its ratification. There are too many commendable provisions in the covenant of the league of nations that deserve a confident trial and too many treaty provisions that are essential to the interests of this Government to have the treaty itself killed; but I have every sympathy with and a clear conviction in favor of such reservations as will safeguard the essential rights of our country, and such reservations are far more important alike for the interests of the United States and for the welfare of the world than an imperfect, American-jeopardizing league of nations can ever be.

Quite apart from our own national standpoint, it is essential for the peace of the world that the United States should continue to be, as it was when we entered the war, the great independent stabilizing power of the world. In any future event of world danger we will be of far greater service if we stand ready to strike quickly, if force be necessary, and with invincible power, as our conscience and judgment shall at the time incline us, unfettered by entanglements and alliances that may throw a mist around our wisdom and make difficult the path of honor and duty.

The real issue before the American people is as to whether they prefer to take the treaty precisely as it is written or to have such reservations ingrafted into it as will absolutely safeguard our American rights, constitutional, domestic, and traditional, and fully protect our independence of action as a Nation in the future. It is not unfair to state, in the light of known facts, that the treaty of peace which we are now considering is peculiarly—and it seems to me unfortunately, so far as the United States is concerned—a one-man document. Always heretofore in the negotiations with other nations it has been usual first for our ambassadors or our commissioners to arrive as best they could at an agreement with the other nations concerning the subject of the treaty; and when, after the exercise of their best judgment, they have finally arrived at an agreement, it has then been forwarded to the President, who, in conference with the State Department, has given to it the weight of their joint consideration and judgment, with the view to correct and to perfect; and it is only when the treaty has thus been subjected, so far as the interests of this Government are concerned, to the consideration of at least two partially separate and independent agencies, that it finally comes to the Senate under the provision of the Constitution for the advice and consent of the Senate.

Manifestly, such a course has been of the utmost advantage in protecting the interests of this country. It does not necessarily follow, because a treaty has been deprived of this triple consideration and has been the result of the judgment and will of a single man, that it ought to be rejected, but it certainly is true that there can be no just complaint if such a one-man treaty is subjected to the most careful examination and consideration, and particularly when, as in the present instance, it is a treaty that concerns the interests of this country and the welfare of the world more greatly than any document ever before penned by the hand of man. The representative of every other great nation at the peace table had back of him both legislative sanction and legislative cooperation. The President of the United States alone of those with whom he was associated acted without either such sanction or conference. It was a position of autocratic power, which is as rare as it is unfortunate in a Republic. In the one case of which we have accurate knowledge, of the four gentlemen whom the President had associated with him as commissioners to represent the United States, at least three were clear and positive in the expression of their judgment that the provision of the treaty with regard to the Shantung Peninsula was a violation of our own American polity, an injustice to China, and an unnecessary yielding to the unfair demands of Japan; and yet the fact that his joint commissioners so determined and so advised did not change by a hair's breadth the action of the United States in regard to Shantung. It was written precisely as the will and judgment of the President finally consented that it should be written, and entirely irrespective of the wishes or judgment or conscience of his associates.

When, as the President solemnly declares, the secret treaty between England and France and Italy and Japan was first called to his attention at Paris, I am sure it is inconceivable to many upon the floor of this Chamber, as it is to me, why, as an American—and particularly as an American who had announced in lofty phraseology which has never been excelled, and rarely equaled, the great principles that should control his action and his opposition to secret treaties between great powers affecting the rights of unconsenting people—I say, it is inconceivable why, as an American, he should not instantly have said to the representatives of England and France and Italy and Japan who were seated with him at the table something in substance like this:

"Gentlemen, I learn for the first time of the secret treaty which you have made between yourselves. I do not impugn the motive or the necessity which may have been the cause of its original creation, but as we now come together to consider the welfare of the world, and to consider it alone upon the principles of honor and of justice, I say to you in the name of the United States that before we enter upon this conference that secret treaty, by the consent of every one of you who formed it, must now be laid upon the table and canceled, in order that we may proceed, unfettered by secrecy, to do now what is right in the matter. I will not enter into a conference with my hands tied by a secret arrangement concerning which I had no information whatsoever."

No one who realizes the commanding importance of the position of the United States at that conference can have the slightest doubt that a demand of the kind indicated would have been instantly complied with, and we should have at least been saved the humiliating disgrace of having our representatives voluntarily enter into an arrangement which they themselves are unable to defend and which the Nation looks upon with shame. There are lawyers in this body, and it is inconceivable to a lawyer that he, together with four colleagues, should sit upon a bench and undertake the determination of a question, when he knew that three of those four colleagues had already prejudged the very case upon which he was then called to decide. China, as the litigant, comes before the "big five." There is England, and Italy, and France, and Japan, and the United States, and before that tribunal China pleads her cause, when three of that court had already, by a secret treaty with a fourth member of that court, absolutely predetermined the question which China was then presenting.

I say, with all the conviction in my power, that the treaty of peace as it is now written will never be ratified by the Senate of the United States, and that before it ever receives the sanction of the representatives of the people here assembled, reservations similar in effect to those which the Committee on Foreign Relations have already reported must be inseparably interwoven with the ratification itself. Language and detail of reservations may be changed, but the purpose and the object of every one of those four reservations are essential to the future greatness and stability of this country.

Concerning the inherent merit of the reservations themselves there can be no difference of opinion. Every one of them announces an American doctrine which is essential to the preservation of the Republic. The principles which they enunciate are principles about which, as Americans, we are all agreed. The only answer that has been made or that can be made to them is either that they are unnecessary, because the rights which they seek to protect are already safeguarded in the treaty itself, or because to ingraft them into the ratification would create complications with other nations more disastrous than the advantage of the reservations could possibly be. The answer to the first proposition is simple and complete. If there is no objection to the inherent merit of the principles announced by the reservations, then, at the most, they can be nothing more than mere surplusage, amplifying or elucidating that which is already provided in the treaty itself; but there are multitudes of people who believe, as I believe, and as I expect by a single illustration to demonstrate in a moment to the Senate, that the principles safeguarded by these reservations are not protected in the treaty as it is now written, that the essential rights of our country are in real, not imagined, jeopardy, by the existing provisions of the league of nations, and that not alone because of that candor and fairness which is due to other nations, but in order to insure confidence and understanding at home, it is essential that our established rights be indicated in language that can not be misunderstood.

The answer to the second defense is precisely the same, for if, as I believe and assert, our right of withdrawal and the safeguarding of the Monroe doctrine and the protection of our domestic and internal affairs and our position before the world that no other nation or combination of nations can ever be allowed to dictate when or where an American soldier or sailor shall be sent, are jeopardized by the treaty as it is now written, then whatever may be the complications that may result from insisting upon such vital rights, such complications fade into insignificance in comparison with our essential duty to safeguard our own country. I can not see any delay or complication that ought to follow from American safeguarding reservations. If, as the President declares, the principles of these reservations are already written into the treaty as it now stands and are accepted by every other nation, certainly there can be neither delay nor complication in any consent either by express approval or by acquiescence in reservations which express in clearer terms that to which the nations have already consented.

I said by a single illustration I intended to establish that some of the fundamental rights of this country are in jeopardy. Here is my illustration: It seems as if those who wrote article 10 of the league of nations had in mind, and wisely had in mind, the prevention of external aggression upon the territorial integrity of any other nation, because such external aggression breeded war, and war was the thing which the league of nations wanted to make impossible. They failed, however, to recognize that there may be external aggression upon the territorial integrity of another nation which is absolutely essential to the integrity of the invading government, and in no case is that more clear than with the United States.

If we had a map of the United States upon the wall we could refresh our memory by looking at the State of California. At the south of the State of California there extends southward generally that long peninsula which is called Lower California. It has little agricultural value. The cost of irrigation that would make it agriculturally available is prohibitive. But it has upon its western border the Bay of Magdalena, the most wonderful assembling ground for a navy upon the whole Pacific coast, except perhaps the port of San Francisco, and it has great fields that lend themselves to the mobilization of an army.

Lower California belongs to Mexico. Mexico has long wanted to sell. The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has upon more than one occasion advocated the acquisition of Lower California upon the part of this Government by purchase. Mexico has been seeking a purchaser. Japan has wanted to buy. I do not know, nor does any other Senator upon the floor of the Senate know, that Japan has not already bought Lower California. When there is an article in commerce and he who has it is keen to sell and is met by some one eager to buy and unmindful of the price, the consummated sale is apt to follow. If Japan has bought it, or if Japan should buy it, it immediately has become or would become the territorial integrity of Japan. They have as much right to buy Lower California as we had to buy the Virgin Islands from Denmark not long ago. If that sale has been completed, or should be completed in the future, what stands in the way of the transaction? Nothing in the world except the announcement and the enforcement of our own Monroe doctrine. If we could imagine the Japanese ambassador sitting upon one side of the table and the Mexican ambassador sitting upon the other side of the table negotiating about Lower California, and could witness the conclusion when the Japanese ambassador said, "There is your money," and the Mexican ambassador said, "There is your deed," the transaction would be complete. If either one of them had lifted his eyes ever so little, he would have seen the strong arm of the manhood of the United States declaring to the ambassador of Japan, "You dare not buy," and to the ambassador of Mexico, "You dare not sell property that shall come under the domination of Japan and that lies upon the threshold of the American Republic."

Yet, with that sale consummated, or to be consummated, and with Lower California a part of the territorial integrity of Japan, there is not a man in the Senate who does not know that the news of that transaction would not be 24 hours old before an American Army would be marching to Lower California, and the Japanese outposts upon the point at Magdalena Bay would see the smoke of American men-of-war advancing to drive out the Japanese fleet from its assembly grounds. When the American troops came on their way, and the American fleet proceeded toward the bay, under this treaty what would Japan do? She would say to England and to France and to Italy, the nations whose sons have mingled their blood with the blood of our own, "Come; the United States by external aggression, is invading my territorial integrity, and I demand of France and England and Belgium and Italy that you rally around me and fight with me to offset the American Army that I see advancing and the American Navy that is steaming toward my vessels." If France and England and Italy and Belgium kept their word as it is written in this treaty, they would be bound to come to the assistance of Japan as against the United States.

If you say that the language of the treaty is that a regional understanding, whatever a regional understanding may be, like the Monroe doctrine, protects that territory against acquisition by purchase, as I have illustrated, you have made a proposition which fails upon the contemplation of it, for the Monroe doctrine is neither international nor regional. It is an American self-protecting doctrine which had its origin in this country alone, and which must have its enforcement alone from this Nation.

Before the treaty of peace, including the league of nations, with provisions such as I have indicated, can ever meet with the sanction of America, there must be written into it, not by interpretation, but by inseparable reservations which shall be interwoven into the language of the ratification itself, that nothing in it shall ever lessen or destroy the Monroe doctrine of the United States. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to admonish the occupants of the galleries that by the rules of the Senate applause is not tolerated.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

During the delivery of Mr. SPENCER's speech,

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that House bill 8624, the food-control bill, be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not understand the Senator's request.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that House bill 8624, the food-control bill, be taken up.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the Senator from Missouri can not yield for that purpose without yielding the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the food-control bill be laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator very much.

After the conclusion of Mr. SPENCER'S speech,

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when this bill was called up. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is very much interested in the bill, as is also the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. Both are absent to-day, and I should like very much to have the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was made the unfinished business of the Senate at the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. The Secretary will state the first amendment of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the desire of some Senators to be present who are not now here, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on official business.

I wish to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are detained on business of the Senate.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained from the Senate on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for a division.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for a division.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll has already disclosed the absence of a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

On a division the motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 10, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 9, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord of Heaven above and of earth below, these glowing days of sun and heat bid us rise and labor while it is yet day; for the night cometh when no man can work. Take from us our procrastination and our indifference. Make us diligent and useful. In these trying and perplexing times break for us the spell of names and phrases. Give us an insight into realities and a vision of true ideals. Then, Lord, may we do our duty faithfully, live honestly, toil earnestly with Thee and all lovers of mankind, and rejoice with inward peace; until at last, called from labor to refreshment, we discover the end of this life to be only the beginning of another and an everlasting life, assured to us by all the intimations of the soul, revealed by all Thy teachings of immortality, confirmed by Christ's own resurrection and ascension. There let us find a reward and a crown won by our faith, hope, and love. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I notice the Journal read by the Clerk announces that the chairman of the committee was directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to call up certain bills. Is that correct? The chairman is authorized under the rule to call up the bills himself on District day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that that is the usual form in journalizing.

Mr. MAPES. The committee authorizes the report and I understood that was the method on Calendar Wednesday on the call of committees, but on District day I supposed the chairman had a right to call bills up without being directed by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that that is the usual form in the Journal. The Chair will not pass upon the parliamentary accuracy of it.

THE PROHIBITION BILL.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6810, the prohibition enforcement bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman let that go over for an hour or two? Some of the amendments, I think, the House might want to vote on, or at least have some agreement with the committee as to the policy to be pursued by the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the House will probably be in Committee of the Whole during the day.

Mr. GARNER. I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to be put in the attitude of objecting to sending the bill to conference, but there are some amendments upon which I think the House ought to have some assurance on the part of the conferees as to the position they are going to take in conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that the committee might rise early enough to take it up before adjournment.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 288.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8778, being an act to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act. There shall be not to exceed three hours' general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read and considered for amendment. At the conclusion of such consideration the bill, together with amendments, if any, shall be reported to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the amendments and the bill to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules probably has not reported a resolution this session that will meet the universal approval of Members of the House more than this resolution to make in order a bill that provides for certain changes in the administration of and the fundamental law establishing the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

This bureau more than any other bureau in any executive department of Washington has been universally condemned by the people, by the soldiers who have tried to take out and carry insurance, and also by Members of the House who have tried to help these men. Whether this is entirely on account of the administration of the bureau or the fundamental law that established the bureau I do not know, but it is certain the House can and must do something in order to straighten out the bureau and make it more efficient to do the work that was intended than it is doing at the present time.

I understand about 75 per cent of the insurance has already been canceled, and that the bureau is serving to-day less than 25 per cent of the people it was expected to serve. This bureau has been established and is being carried on at a very great expense, and we should enact some legislation that will see that this bureau is immediately straightened out and administered in a more businesslike manner. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before the House this session. It deals with nearly 14,000 employees in the District of Columbia, and it is of special interest to men, women, and children in every congressional district in the country. It should receive the most careful and considerate attention from every Member of the House.

The request for the rule was unanimous from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the rule was reported unanimously from the Committee on Rules. As far as I know there is no request for time on the rule. Therefore, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 15 minutes on the subject I suggested yesterday morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 15 minutes on the question that he raised yesterday morning. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BOIES. I hope the gentleman will not object; I will take but a few minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that pending going into the Committee of the Whole under the rule, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] may be given an opportunity to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota renews his request that the bill H. R. 6810, with Senate amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments disagreed to, and a conference asked. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman had any understanding with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the bill as it came over from the Senate yesterday been printed, with the Senate amendments?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It has been printed.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that the request of the gentleman from Texas to defer action on this for a short time is no longer insisted upon?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He is not insisting upon that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if it is not out of order I would like to inquire as to the conferees. I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is out of the city.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. WEBB will be here to-morrow.

Mr. DYER. I was in hopes that it might be possible to get at least one conferee who is not a rank prohibitionist, though I do not know that it would do any good.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I think we can safely leave our interests in the hands of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. WEBB.

WAR RISK INSURANCE BUREAU.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, before we go into the Committee of the Whole I ask unanimous consent that after I have used five minutes of general debate I may be permitted to turn over the time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], chairman of the subcommittee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that unanimous consent is not required for that. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one and a half hours.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to utilize but five minutes of that time, and in those five minutes I wish to direct my attention particularly to the provision in the first section of the bill relating to the fixing of the salary of the director general. It will be noticed in the bill that the salary for this officer is fixed at $10,000 per annum. The bill provides for abolishing the office of Commissioner of Military and Naval Insurance, and also the office of Marine and Seamen's Insurance. Each of these officials is now paid a salary of $4,000 per annum.

Under the existing law the director general receives $5,000. Increasing his salary to $10,000 per annum and abolishing the two commissioners will result in a saving to the Government of $3,000. When the bill is considered under the five-minute rule I have no doubt there will be discussion of amendments seeking to modify the recommendation of the committee with reference to the salary of the director general. I wish to make a few remarks in support of the recommendation of the committee for a salary of $10,000. As a justification for our recommendation I can give to the House the precedents already established by the Federal Government.

The Assistant Attorneys General of the United States now receive $7,500 per annum.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue by act of Congress receives $10,000 per annum, the same amount that we seek to give to the Director General of War Risk Insurance by this bill.

Members of various commissions, such as the Tariff Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and others are now being paid the sum of $10,000 per annum. These are precedents which can be invoked to justify the $10,000 which we seek to grant to the director general in this bill.

The Board for Vocational Education had one officer to whom was paid the sum of $10,000. If we go further than that and direct our attention to the salaries paid by the United States Railroad Administration, we find these facts: The director general himself is paid $25,000. The general assistant is paid $15,000. The financial assistant is paid $12,000. The assistant to the director general is paid $10,000.

The Director of the Division of Finance is paid $25,000. The treasurer is paid $10,000. The Director of the Division of Purchase is paid $25,000. The Director of Capital Expenditures, formerly an honored Member of this House and at one time chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is paid $25,000. The assistant director is paid $10,600.

The Director of the Division of Operations—except car-service section—is paid $25,000, the assistant director $10,000. The assistant director in the Division of Operations is paid $14,000, and another assistant is paid $10,000.

The manager of car service is paid $10,000.

The Director of the Division of Traffic is paid $25,000. His assistant director is paid $15,000, and another assistant is paid $12,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has used five minutes of his time.

Mr. ESCH. I will take another three minutes.

The assistant director is paid $10,000. The Director of the Division of Public Service is paid $25,000, and so on.

Now, when we come to the regional directors, the men who are in charge of the railroads in the various regions into which the United States has been divided, we find that there are five regional directors, to whom are paid the sum of $50,000 each and two to whom are paid the sum of $40,000 each.

So there is abundant precedent for establishing the salary of $10,000 for the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. When we consider the amount of work that has been placed upon the shoulders of the Director of War Risk Insurance, the salary that we here recommend is inadequate, considering the larger salaries paid to these various other Government officials.

I do not know whether we fully realize the responsibility of the Director of War Risk Insurance. Last year the sum of $550,000,000 passed through his office. The outstanding insurance to-day amounts to $39,633,000,000, more insurance than is written by the five largest insurance companies in the world, and these insurance companies pay their presidents $50,000 a year each. It will be remembered that in the War Risk Insurance Bureau there are 13,500 officials and employees and that they handle the insurance of over 4,000,000 men. In view of these facts the committee believe that the $10,000 that we recommend is not exorbitant. It is perhaps not even adequate. But the committee did not feel warranted in exceeding the amount of $10,000. We believe that the present director is a man who is desirous of putting this great bureau upon an efficient working basis, and I think every Member of this House in the recent weeks has seen that there has been a greater efficiency in the operations of the War Risk Insurance Bureau than there was formerly. He is devoting his whole energy to making a success of this bureau, which affects so many millions of men who fought for the Nation. Under these circumstances and in view of these conditions and of the work and responsibility put upon him the committee believe that a salary of $10,000 is not too large.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used his additional three minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] may have charge of the remaining time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] control the balance of the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with everything that has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] with reference to the compensation provided for the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Therefore it would be useless to reiterate what the gentleman has so well presented to the committee. When we reach that part of the bill in the five-minute debate, if there are amendments seeking to reduce the amount I will then occupy the floor in opposition to such amendments.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] were members of the subcommittee that prepared this bill, and are much better acquainted with its details than I am. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] have control of the remainder of the time for general debate on this side, with the privilege of yielding it as he may see proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] will control the balance of the time on that side.

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Will raising the salary of this office change the personnel of the office in any way?

Mr. SIMS. Not that I know of, Mr. Chairman. I have not the honor or the pleasure of personal acquaintance with the present Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, Col. R. G. Cholmeley-Jones.

As far as my support of the increase of salary is concerned it has no personal bias whatever. This bureau is going to operate for many years and it has got to have a man of ability regardless of politics or anything of that kind.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not care anything about the name or politics. If he is working for $5,000 I wondered if it was intended to get a different man for $10,000.

Mr. SIMS. I think the present salary is $6,000; but if there is any contemplated change as to the director I do not know anything about it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It is just a raise of salary?

Mr. SIMS. It is to provide compensation for any man who holds that office, whether he be the present director or some other man. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I shall take 30 minutes of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to proceed for a time in the explanation of this bill, if possible, without interruption, believing that as the sections of the bill are explained that it will answer many questions that are uppermost in the minds of Members of the House at this time relative to this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted for the present.

Mr. SWEET. The war-risk insurance act was approved on October 6, 1917, just six months after war had been declared. This legislation was enacted in the interests of every commissioned officer and enlisted man and every member of the Army and Navy Nurse Corps when employed in the active service under the War and Navy Departments of the United States Government.

Article 1 of the act relates to the establishment in the Treasury Department of a bureau to be known as the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In this bureau there is a Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance and a Division of Military and Naval Insurance. In general, article 1 relates to the organization and administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Article 2 relates to allotments and family allowances.

Article 3 relates to compensation for death or disability.

Article 4 relates to what is generally known as war-risk insurance.

It may be generally stated that under article 2 of the act allotments, both voluntary and involuntary, are taken out of the pay of soldiers, sailors, and marines. The family allowances are paid by the United States Government.

Under article 3 compensation for death or disability is paid by the United States Government.

Under article 4 the Government assumed all expenses of organization and what might be termed overhead expenses in connection with war-risk insurance, and the soldiers and sailors and marines pay the premiums on their insurance policies out of their pay. In short, the Government pays the family allowances and bears all expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability costs resulting from the hazards of war in connection with war-risk insurance, while the soldiers, sailors, and marines pay the voluntary and involuntary allotments and premiums upon their insurance policies out of their own pay.

This legislation was enacted in the interest of the soldiers, sailors, and marines engaged in the Great War for the benefit of themselves, their wives, their children, and those who may be dependent upon them for maintenance and support during the great emergency through which we have just passed.

The family allowance feature of article 2 of the bill will undoubtedly be closed within four months after the President issues his official proclamation of peace. The involuntary-allotment feature will be discontinued. The voluntary-allotment feature will be continued in force and effect for those who remain in the service and who are a part of the military and naval forces of the Government.

The compensation feature for death and disability as provided in article 3 will undoubtedly continue as a permanent policy of the Government.

The insurance feature of the bill as provided in article 4 is now in process of readjustment and, I might say, reorganization to meet the present conditions and uncertainties brought about largely by the demobilization of the Army and Navy. What will be the permanent policy of the Government in this respect will be for Congress to determine through the enactment of proper and salutary legislation.

Your committee has had before it for consideration 3 resolutions and 28 bills suggesting amendments and changes in the war-risk insurance act. These resolutions and bills cover a wide range and have forcibly brought to the attention of your committee defects in the present law which should be corrected in so far as it is possible in order that those who are deeply interested in this particular legislation may receive the benefits to which they are entitled, that their rights may be conserved, and their intentions carried out by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in an expeditious, orderly, and just manner.

Your committee in preparing the bill that we are now considering has had the friendly cooperation of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Members of Congress who have introduced resolutions and bills suggesting modifications and amendments to the present law.

The bill that we are now considering is largely the embodiment of the suggestions that the committee has thus received.

I might say that the whole purpose of the committee has been, in so far as it may be possible, to comply with the wishes of all persons who are interested and concerned in legislation pertaining to the war-risk insurance act.

I believe that I am not going too far when I say that if your committee really knew what a majority of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of this country desire in connection with this class of legislation they would gladly enact it into law, having full faith and confidence that the sailors, soldiers, and marines of the Republic would not demand that which would not comport with the best interests of their Government and the happiness and contentment of its people.

Having made these brief general observations in regard to the war-risk insurance act, I will now take up for discussion each section of the proposed bill and explain to the committee, if possible, the purposes and necessities for this legislation.

Section 1 provides for the abolition of the office of Commissioner of Marine and Seamen's Insurance and the office of Commissioner of Military and Naval Insurance, and transfers their powers to the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and increases the director's salary from $5,000 to $10,000 per annum, the salaries which the aforesaid commissioners now receive being $4,000 each per annum. These salaries are done away with, thus saving to the Government $3,000 per annum and consolidating the various divisions under one head, and largely placing all responsibility and power in the hands of the director. The simple reduction in the salary and saving to the Government of $3,000, however, is not by any means the main reason for the increase in the salary of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance from $5,000 to $10,000 per annum. The Treasury Department is earnestly in favor of this increase in the salary of the director. I wish to call your attention to the statement made by the Treasury Department in this connection:

> The War Risk Bureau has become very much the largest bureau of the Government. There are at the present time about 13,500 employees working in the bureau here in Washington. The amount of money passing through the bureau last year amounted to something like $550,000,000. The Government's liability for insurance outstanding through the bureau is over $39,000,000,000. The bureau has been, I think, concededly one of the most difficult propositions ever undertaken by the Government to work out and to get in such shape that it would properly perform the functions for which it was intended. In the extent of personnel to be dealt with, in the amount of money to be handled, in the scope of the insurance field embraced within the activities of the bureau, and in the importance of the service to be performed to a very large number of American citizens, the director of the bureau has a task that is trying, almost beyond description. Not only is a man of especial experience required, but a man also who possesses executive qualifications of the highest order and the vision to compass the farthing possibilities of the bureau's future.

The officers of many of the large insurance companies of this country receive from twenty-five to fifty thousand per annum. The director is not only at the head of the insurance feature, as provided in the war-risk insurance act, but he is at the head of the family allowance and allotment division, the compensation and disability division—in short, he is the administrative head of the marine and seamen's insurance and the military and naval insurance, the language of the bill being:

> That the office of the commissioner of military and naval insurance and the office of the commissioner of marine and seamen's insurance created by the war-risk insurance act are hereby abolished, and the powers and duties pertaining to such offices are hereby transferred to the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Hon. Carter Glass, the Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to the chairman of the committee, stated:

> After a careful survey of the entire country, I selected the present director of the bureau as, in my opinion, the best equipped man of whom I knew to fill the position. I was able to persuade him to accept the very great responsibilities and very arduous duties of the place, although it required a decided sacrifice on his part. I told him that I should do what was in my power to induce Congress to increase the salary as above suggested, both because I realized that it is a position of such importance that it should carry the higher salary, and, further, because I felt it unfair to ask him to give up the prospects immediately in front of him and to enter the Government service at a lower wage.

When you take into consideration the responsibility and the unusual executive ability that a proper administration of this office demands, and when you realize that 4,000,000 men are interested in the Government's endeavors in this respect, it appears to me that it would be natural for your committee to conclude that the salary of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance should be increased to $10,000 per annum.

Section 2 of the bill is an amendment to section 22 of the war-risk insurance act, wherein the term "child" is defined to include "a child legally adopted," without reference as to when and where adopted.

Section 3 is an amendment to section 22 of the war-risk insurance act, the term "child" being defined to include an "illegitimate child," but as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing signed by him or if he is judicially ordered and decreed to contribute to such child's support.

Section 4 is an amendment to section 22 of the war risk insurance act, by adding thereto subdivision 4a, the term father and mother being defined—> to include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military and naval forces for a period of not less than one year: Provided, That this subdivision shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917.

Subdivision 4 of section 22 of the war-risk insurance act is as follows:

> The term "parent" includes a father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, father through adoption, mother through adoption, stepfather, and stepmother, either of the person in the service or of the spouse.

The proposed amendment 4a defines father and mother to include persons who have stood in loco parentis to a soldier or sailor for a period of not less than one year. Many cases have come to the attention of the committee where the soldier has designated an aunt or an uncle or some one who has stood in the position of a parent prior to his entering the service. When the matter has been presented to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance these persons were not within the permitted class of beneficiaries. The intention of the soldier has thus been defeated, and the insurance would go to the father, if living, who has never perhaps paid any attention to the boy, has never furnished him any maintenance and support, thus defeating the intent of the soldier. With this provision in the bill, if the soldier has designated his aunt who in reality has been a mother to him, has assisted him in obtaining his schooling and furnished him maintenance and support, she will in fact become his beneficiary and receive the insurance money.

I have a case at point from my own district. A young man named William H. Farmer, when about 5 or 6 years of age was taken from an orphans' home at Dubuque, Iowa, by one Mrs. Ella Hentz, of Independence, Iowa. She brought up this boy—she expected to adopt him, but did not do so legally. He referred to her as mother in his letters. When he designated her as beneficiary in the policy of insurance he referred to her as mother. The boy died in the service in France. When Mrs. Hentz filed her claim with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and all the facts were clearly disclosed, it was found that she was not in fact his mother, neither had she legally adopted him. Under the present law it became the duty of the director of the bureau to deny the claim. Under the provisions of this amendment she will become the beneficiary of William H. Farmer, the intent of the soldier will be carried out, and justice will be done. This provision is made retroactive from and after October 6, 1917.

Section 5 relates to persons who may be confined in an asylum or hospital for the insane maintained by the United States, where no guardian or curator of their property has been duly appointed. The director, after due investigation, may order all moneys payable to him to be held in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such person. It also provides that funds so held may be disbursed by the director at his discretion to the chief executive officer of the asylum or hospital in which such person is an inmate to be used by such officer for the maintenance and comfort of such inmate and account to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

It further provides that if at any time such inmate shall be found to be mentally competent, or die, or a guardian or curator of his estate be appointed, any balance remaining to the credit of such inmate shall be paid to him if competent, and otherwise to his guardian, curator, or personal representative. This provision is put in the act for the benefit of anyone that may be confined in an asylum or hospital for the insane maintained by the United States, and thus it will not require the long delay that is ofttimes necessitated in having a proper guardian appointed to take care of the property of the inmate of such a hospital before the inmate may receive the much-needed financial assistance.

Section 6 amends section 28 of the war-risk insurance act, which at present prohibits the assignment by any person to whom converted insurance shall be payable. In other words, under the present law the beneficiary of an insurance policy can not assign his rights therein.

Section 6 of this bill permits the assignment by a beneficiary of his interest in a policy of converted insurance to any other member of the permitted class of beneficiaries.

The present term insurance or yearly renewable insurance will not be assignable by any person to whom such insurance shall be payable under article 4 of the war-risk insurance act, the view of the committee being that after the term insurance has been converted that the beneficiary has a vested interest therein, and should have the right to assign his interest therein to any other member of the permitted class of beneficiaries.

Section 7 of the bill is an amendment to section 29 of the war-risk insurance act, and applies only to converted insurance under article 4 of such act. If a person has converted his term insurance, the beneficiary should have the right to receive the insurance regardless of whether the soldier, sailor, or marine was a deserter, or guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or any offense of moral turpitude or willful and persistent misconduct.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SWEET. I prefer not to yield at this time; I shall be glad to do so later.

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask a question upon this point, but I will be glad to defer it.

Mr. SWEET. And a little later I shall be glad to yield.

The view of the committee was that where the term insurance has been converted that it is in the nature of an investment the same as in old-line insurance policies, and that the insurance should not be terminated, but should be kept in full force and effect.

This amendment simply relates to insurance and does not change the law as to compensation under article 3 of the act.

Section 8 simply adds a new section to the war-risk insurance act to be known as section 31. The fore part of this section simply defines what constitutes active service in the military or naval forces of the United States. This provision is in accord with the construction that has been placed upon the provisions of the war-risk insurance act by the bureau in administering the present law.

The section provides that no person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act until he has been examined at the camp or other place of mobolization and upon such examination accepted and enrolled for active service. It was deemed best to place in the law this definite pronouncement of the rule followed by the bureau in view of the latter provisions of this section.

This section provides that if, after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person dies or has become disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty, and not due to his own willful misconduct, he shall be entitled to the benefits of compensation provided under article 3 of the act. It is also provided further that any insurance application made by a person after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, shall be deemed valid.

Section 8 of the bill is to cover cases in which a soldier has been inducted by the local draft board, and while he is on his way to camp and before he has been enrolled in the active service in the military forces of the United States he is injured in the line of duty, and not because of his own willful misconduct, will be entitled to compensation. An application made by such a soldier for insurance during that period will also be valid.

Section 9 of the bill amends section 204 of the war-risk insurance act by striking out the word "one" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "four." Section 204 is a part of article 2 of the war-risk insurance act, which relates to family allowances and allotments. Under the present law family allowances shall not be paid for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency. The proposed amendment changes section 204 so that it will read:

> Family allowances shall be paid from the time of enlistment to death in or one month after discharge from the service, but not for more than four months after the termination of the present war emergency.

This does not change the law in regard to discharged soldiers, but simply applies to those who are in the service at the date of the President's proclamation of peace.

In other words, the family allowance feature of the war-risk insurance act will terminate four months after the President issues his official proclamation of peace. This provision is placed in the bill at the suggestion of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Treasury Department, so that ample time may be given to properly close and terminate all matters in regard to family allowances and make adjustments relative to compulsory allotments.

Section 10 amends article 2 of the war-risk insurance act which relates to allotments by adding thereto section 211. This section provides that all family allowances and allotments payable by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the authority of article 2 of the act shall be discontinued at the end of the fourth calendar month after the termination of the present war emergency as declared by proclamation of the President, and thereafter all allotments of pay shall be voluntary and shall be under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively. In other words, under sections 9 and 10 of this bill all family allowances and compulsory allotments shall be discontinued and whatever allotments are thereafter made shall be purely voluntary and shall be made under such regulations as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

Section 11 is an amendment to section 302 of the war-risk insurance act. Section 11 of this bill is practically the same as the bill introduced by Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas, on May 28, 1919, and during the present session of Congress.

Mr. RAYBURN, as you are probably aware, has had more to do with the enactment of the war-risk insurance law than any other member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, I might add with propriety, more than any other Member of Congress. He reported the act to the House, which was approved October 6, 1917, and explained and amplified its provisions when it was presented to the House. He should be given full credit for the great service that he has rendered the Nation in being mainly instrumental in putting through this piece of constructive and far-reaching legislation. [Applause.]

I have said this much in favor of the services of Mr. RAYBURN, for I believe that he is entitled to and deserves this recognition for the painstaking and careful preparation that is necessary for a full understanding and the presentation of so technical a subject.

It must also be remembered that this legislation was passed for the benefit of those who were actively engaged in defending our country against a foreign foe during one of the most exacting and critical periods of our Nation's history.

The benefits derived and to be derived from this legislation can not be fully realized and measured at this time.

Mr. RAYBURN not only reported to the House the act of October 6, 1917, but he also reported to the House another bill amending some of the important features of the act, which was approved June 25, 1918.

I am sure that you will find that section 11 of this bill, which is practically the same as the bill that he recently introduced, has been carefully prepared and will meet with your unqualified approval. Section 11 has to do with the compensation that is to be paid disabled persons who were a part of the Military and Naval Establishments of the Government during the recent war and in a sense is comparative to the pension legislation enacted in behalf of the soldiers of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars.

Under the act approved June 25, 1918, which was an amendment to the original war-risk insurance act, a disability resulting from injury in the service whereby the disabled person has neither wife nor child living the compensation is $30. Under this bill it is $80. If he has a wife but no child living, under the present law, $45; under this bill, $90. If he has a wife and one child living, under the present law, $55; under this bill, $95. If he has a wife and two or more children living, under the present law, $65; under this bill, $100. If he has no wife but one child living, under the present law, $40, with $10 for each additional child up to two; under this bill, $90, with $5 for each additional child up to two. If he has a mother or father either or both dependent upon him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent. This provision is the same as the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 30 minutes.

Mr. SWEET. I shall take 15 minutes longer. If, while the disability is rated as partial and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and temporary disability equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be paid for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

In other words, where the department rates the disability as partial and temporary the compensation shall be a percentage of the amount or amounts set forth in this bill for total and temporary disability.

If, while the disability is rated as total and permanent, the compensation shall be $100, the bill specifically provides that the loss of both feet or both hands, or the sight of both eyes, or the loss of one foot and one hand, or one foot and the sight of one eye, or one hand and the sight of one eye, or becoming helpless and permanently bedridden shall be deemed to be total permanent disability. In cases of that kind the person will receive $100. The amount is stated. It is not a percentage of the same. In these cases the person is rated as totally and permanently disabled. The bill also provides that for double total permanent disability the rate of compensation shall be $200 per month.

In other words, if the man loses both eyes and both hands, he is entitled to $200 per month as long as he lives, or if he loses both eyes and one hand and one foot, he will receive $200 per month. If, while the disability is rated by the bureau as partial and permanent, the monthly compensation shall be a per cent of the compensation that would have been payable for his total and permanent disability, equal to the degree of reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent. If a person has lost one arm, say at the shoulder, he will be ultimately rated by the department as being partially and permanently disabled, and he will get a per cent of the $100 that is payable for total and permanent disability.

In the hearings, pages 33, 34, 35, and 36, part 1, a tentative schedule of ratings, in accordance with the provisions of this bill, has been submitted by Mr. Macfarlane, the actuary of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. This is a tentative schedule of ratings for partial and permanent disability. On page 35 of the hearings, in the tentative schedule, we find:

Loss of arm at or above elbow joint and below shoulder (major), 70 per cent, or $70; loss of arm at or above elbow joint and below shoulder (minor), 65 per cent, or $65; loss of arm between the elbow and wrist (major), 65 per cent, or $65; loss of arm between elbow and wrist joints (minor), 60 per cent, or $60.

And so on through the various injuries. This rating is based upon the percentage of the compensation that would be payable for a permanent and total disability equal to the degree in the reduction of earning capacity resulting from the disability.

This section also provides that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall adopt a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature. The ratings may be as high as 100 per cent. These ratings shall be based upon the average impairment of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations, and not upon the impairment of earning capacity in each individual case, so that there shall be no reduction in rate of compensation for individual success in overcoming the handicap of a permanent injury. The bureau is authorized from time to time to readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with actual experience.

If a person is so helpless as to be constantly in need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as the director may deem advisable.

Division 6 of section 11 provides that the injured person shall be furnished by the United States Government such reasonable governmental, medical, surgical, and hospital services; supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary. The department may furnish these artificial limbs, trusses, and appliances by purchase or manufacture as the director may determine.

The Bureau of War Risk Insurance is also authorized to furnish medical and hospital services and supplies and appliances as provided in subdivision 6 of this section, to discharged members of the military or naval forces of the Governments which have been associated with us in the war since April 6, 1917, and come within the provisions of laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, at such rates and under such regulations as the director of the bureau may prescribe. This provision of the bill allows the bureau to furnish medical, surgical, and hospital services to soldiers of other Governments who, for instance, are now residing in the United States. On the other hand, the bill provides that we may pay the Governments who were associated with us in the recent war for taking care of United States soldiers who are now living within the territorial limits of such Governments. In other words, it gives the Bureau of War Risk Insurance authority to establish a reciprocal policy in taking care of the soldiers who fought in the Great War. To illustrate: Some twenty or thirty thousand American citizens were a part of the Canadian Army, and of necessity the Canadian Government must look after the soldiers that have been maimed and crippled, no matter where they may reside. Many of these soldiers will return to the United States, and it would be far better for them to receive assistance and medical treatment at our governmental hospitals in the United States than to have the Canadian Government render that service to them within the borders of the United States.

If we render that service for the Canadian Government the Canadian Government can under the provisions of this bill reimburse our Government for the services so rendered. On the other hand, if our soldiers go to Canada, and many undoubtedly will, the Canadian Government under the provisions of this act could give our soldiers medical treatment and furnish them with artificial limbs and appliances, and then call upon our Government to reimburse the Canadian Government for the services rendered and appliances furnished.

Section 11 is made retroactive from and after October 6, 1917.

According to a statement of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the retroactive feature of this particular legislation in regard to increased compensation will cost the Government about $14,500,000.

In a letter addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee the director said in part as follows:

The bill as now reported out of your committee provides for payment of $80 per month to a single man without dependents in case of total temporary disability with additional amounts to men with dependents. As of August 30, 1919, it is estimated that this would cost fourteen and one-half million dollars to pay for the retroactive features and fifty-seven millions to pay for the additional cost on future payments during the balance of the fiscal year 1920.

Right in this connection I wish to call the attention of the House to a number of telegrams which I have received. Here is a telegram from Greenville, S. C., addressed to myself, and it reads as follows:

Seven hundred tubercular ex-service men are deeply grateful for bill you have proposed. We are totally disabled and can never live on $30 a month. We anxiously await passage of this measure.

CHAS. L. SICKLES,
Representing all patients, base hospital.

Here is another telegram I received from Denver, Colo.:

DENVER, COLO., August 26.

Hon. BURTON E. SWEET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, as discharged disabled soldiers, patients of the Agnes Memorial Sanitarium, Denver, Colo., wish to congratulate you for the bill you are introducing in Congress for the increase of our compensation from $30 to $80 per month, also the granting of the automatic insurance. This $30 we now receive is inadequate to our needs. Hoping you succeed in having this bill passed, we wish you the pinnacle of success.

In additon to that I received a letter from the Walter Reed Hospital. It reads as follows:

WALTER REED HOSPITAL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
August 26, 1919.

Congressman SWEET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SWEET: As representatives of the patients of the Walter Reed Hospital we are writing to urge strongly the passage of the war-risk insurance bill (H. R. 8288) as amended and reported to the House.

We, a group of disabled men, feel that we have the right to express our opinion after careful thought and discussion of the matter.

We also urge that this letter be read from the floor of the House at the time of presentation of the bill. If the Members of the House knew how the anxieties of many hundreds of wounded soldiers would be relieved by the provisions of this bill, we feel sure that they would vote for its passage.

Very sincerely, yours,

_____.

In addition to that I read from an article in the American Legion, which is, in part, as follows, in referring to this legislation:

These changes manifestly are necessary in the interests of equity, justice—and the continuance of the war-risk insurance.

The above statements were made after reviewing the various provisions of the bill.

When the changes have been effected, thus adjusting war-risk insurance to a peace-time basis and the wishes of the insured, the present apathy and even antipathy of the former service men to war-risk insurance will disappear. Let us hope that Congress will act in this instance without unnecessary equivocation or delay.

Section 12 amends section 401 of the war-risk insurance act. Section 401 is a part of Title IV of the act and relates to insurance. This section provides for the extension of automatic insurance to cover all men inducted into the service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. This covers the full period of the war. It also further extends automatic insurance to cover all men except those who actually refused to apply for insurance, who were finally accepted for service, and were in the service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. Under the provisions of the original act all soldiers who were in the service on and after the 6th day of April, 1917, who while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after the publication of the terms and conditions of the contract of insurance—or October 15, 1917—had 120 days from and after the 15th day of October, 1917, in which to apply for insurance. This period expired on February 12, 1918. The law also provides that any person in the active service on or after April 6, 1917, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled or dies or has died without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each.

Under the provisions of the present law persons must have been in the service prior to February 12, 1918, in order to be entitled to automatic insurance. Under the present law every soldier that entered the active service was entitled to 120 days in which to apply for insurance, but in order to be entitled to automatic insurance he must have been a member in the active service prior to the 12th day of February, 1918.

This bill provides that any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days after October 15, 1917, or 120 days after entering into or employment in the active service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled or dies or has died without having applied for insurance shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each, unless he actually refuses or has refused to apply for insurance.

This section also provides for the payment of automatic insurance to any person inducted into the service by a local draft board after April 6, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, and who, while in such service and before being accepted and enrolled for active military or naval service, becomes totally and permanently disabled or dies without having applied for insurance shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each.

Section 13 is an amendment to section 402 of the war-risk insurance act. It enlarges the permitted class of beneficiaries so as to include uncles, aunts, nieces, nephews, brothers-in-law, and sisters-in-law of the insured. This section is made retroactive from and after October 6, 1917.

Section 14 provides that in case no person within the permitted class of beneficiaries survives the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the commuted value of monthly installments of yearly renewable term insurance calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum. In other words, in case at the death of the insured there is no one living within the permitted class of beneficiaries, the insurance shall be paid to the personal representatives of the insured in a lump sum.

Section 15 provides that any person to whom such yearly renewable-term insurance is payable dies or his rights are otherwise terminated after the death of the insured, but before all of the 240 installments have been paid, then the insurance money shall go to such persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would under the laws of the State of the residence of the insured be entitled to his property in case of intestacy. And if all the permitted class of beneficiaries be exhausted before 240 installments have been paid, then there shall be paid to the estate of the last surviving person in the permitted class an amount equal to the commuted value of the remaining monthly installments calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 15 additional minutes.

Mr. SWEET. I will yield myself 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SWEET. Section 16 provides that if no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured as beneficiary for converted insurance, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the commuted value of the monthly installments, payable and applicable, calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. If the designated beneficiary survives the insured and dies before receiving all of the installments of converted insurance, then there shall be paid to the estate of such beneficiary an amount equal to the commuted value of the monthly installments so payable and applicable calculated on the basis of interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

Section 17 provides that the bureau may make provisions in the contract for converted insurance for optional settlements to be selected by the insured whereby such insurance may be made payable either in one sum or in installments of 36 months or more.

Section 18 provides that all premiums paid on account of insurance converted shall be deposited and covered in the Treasury to the credit of the United States Government life insurance fund, and shall be available for the payment of loss, dividends, and other benefits provided under such insurance.

This section also provides that the bureau is hereby authorized to set aside out of the funds so collected such reserve funds as may be required under accepted actuarial principles to meet all liability under such insurance, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest and reinvest the said United States Government life insurance fund, or any part thereof, in interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and to sell the obligations for the purposes of said fund. This does not permit any of this fund to be invested in Federal farm-land bank bonds.

Section 19 provides that the amount of the monthly installments of allotments and family allowances, compensation, or yearly renewable term insurance which has become payable under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same may be payable to the personal representatives of the insured.

This, I believe, completes a rather careful analysis of the provisions of this bill, and I trust that they will meet with the approval of the Members of the House.

I trust that it will be of benefit to the director and his assistants in the administration of the war-risk insurance act, and that it will prove to be of inestimable benefit to those who are deeply interested in this class of legislation and to those who rendered valiant service to their country during the great crisis in world affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after the very lucid and exhaustive explanation of the amendments to the war-risk insurance bill as given by the very able chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SWEET] it would be almost unnecessary to make any further explanation in regard to those amendments. I feel quite certain that if this committee has paid strict attention to the explanation as given by Mr. SWEET and has carefully read his report there can be no question as to the advisability of these proposed amendments. The amendments taken as a whole might be summarized as to their purpose. The general purpose of those amendments is to enlarge the provisions of the war-risk insurance act and extend them so as to become more beneficial to the insured class and also more beneficial to the class of beneficiaries. Some of the provisions contained in these amendments are primarily intended to extend the beneficiary class. The original act confined the beneficiaries and restricted them to a very limited class, and that was for the purpose, in large measure, of preventing fraud during the time that war-time insurance existed and we had then only war-time insurance. It was deemed wise by the bureau, and by the committee itself, after investigation of the subject, to extend the class of beneficiaries. You will note that in one of the amendments the class is very much enlarged, including stepfathers, stepmothers, aunts, uncles, and those who are in place of parents, or, in the Latin phrase, in loco parentis.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman to yield at that point?

Mr. DEWALT. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I wish to ask a question about subparagraph (4a), on page 2, in which the definition of "father" is enlarged to include one who stands in loco parentis.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The language is:

Persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year.

Does that mean the period of one year must be the year immediately preceding the entrance into the service, or would any year between the infancy of the soldier and the time he enters into the service be sufficient?

Mr. DEWALT. The one year previous to his entering the service.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It seemed to me that that was it.

Mr. DEWALT. And the reason for that, if I may be permitted to explain, is this: That there were a great many young men who went into the Army who were living in families, and it was feared that during the term of the war, and under the war-time insurance, they might conceive the idea that they would select somebody and say to that individual, "You adopt me and stand in the relation of a parent to me, and then if there be death or if there be injury you will receive the benefit of that insurance."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And right in that connection, might it not be that between infancy and the time a man entered the service there might be half a dozen persons who might establish that they stood in loco parentis?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; and it was to provide against such an emergency as that that this bill was framed in the way it was suggested.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I have a peculiar case in the district I represent, and I know of no one that I would rather submit the matter to than to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The case is this: A man was married at the time of his entrance into the war, but there was then pending a proceeding for divorce, but before the divorce is granted—and there was no doubt at all that the decree would be signed—the soldier was killed in France. Immediately application was made on the part of both wives, as they deemed themselves to be, to recover this insurance.

Mr. DEWALT. How did he have two wives if the one was proceeding for divorce? I do not catch that.

Mr. ROSE. That is what I want to bring out. A divorce proceeding was pending, and the lady who married him was assured by the attorney representing the husband that the decree would be signed by the court, but it appears he was married a second time before the decree was signed by the court.

Mr. DEWALT. Your premise is wrong there. He could not have been married the second time. Therefore, the premise is wrong.

Mr. ROSE. The matter was then presented to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and they at once promptly took the ground that the second marriage was void.

Mr. DEWALT. It was void ab initio. They never were married.

Mr. ROSE. That is the ground I took, and therefore the second wife was never the wife of the soldier, and therefore not entitled to the insurance. Now, will there be any proposition of any kind in the shape of amendment offered to the present war-risk insurance act covering a case like that?

Mr. DEWALT. No. And there could not be, for the very good reason that you would not only be condoning a wrong, but you would be actually rewarding the party who made the marriage regardless of law.

Mr. ROSE. It may be stated that this woman who married the man was innocently led into the marriage, but the only person who would suffer would be the real wife.

Mr. DEWALT. The laws are not made for those who are ignorant of the law, but for those who are presumed to know the law. This woman had no right to marry the man until the decree of divorce had been granted by the court.

Mr. ROSE. That is the way I have decided the case, and we have been told that the only way it can be done is to have the war-risk insurance act amended so as to include it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Pursuing the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], subdivision 4 includes the terms "father" and "mother," and they include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year. Many different persons may claim to have stood in loco parentis from the infancy of the child to the time of enlistment in the service, and hence ought not the language there to be amended to limit it to one year immediately preceding the enlistment?

Mr. DEWALT. That is the intention.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I know it is the intent——

Mr. DEWALT. It may be that it could be made clear, and that was the real purpose, that it is to prevent the fraud indicated in my answer to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Maine has raised a very material question, and it can be easily cured by amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. May I ask the gentleman to turn to section 8 of the bill, page 4 of the text? Section 8 creates a new section in the war-risk insurance act, and the first sentence of the new section provides:

That no person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act until he has been examined by the proper medical officer or officers of such forces at the camp or other place of mobilization, and upon such examination accepted and enrolled for active service.

I was rather interested to learn the history and reason of that provision, which is in direct conflict with the policy of the Military Establishment in determining the moment at which a soldier enters the Military Establishment. When a man's notice of induction under the draft was received, he was told to report to his draft board at a given time and place, perhaps the following day, and the induction notice included "from and after the hour just mentioned you will be a soldier in the military service of the United States." Under those conditions I wondered why the committee thought it wise to create a different rule for the beginning of the service within the meaning of this act?

Mr. DEWALT. If you will read the whole section, you will see that the proviso covers that:

Provided, That if, after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person dies or becomes disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line duty—

And so forth. That then, if it is not due to his own negligence or fault, but it happened within the line of duty, all the provisions of this act are applicable to such case.

Mr. ROGERS. I quite understand that, and I entirely sympathize with the purpose of the proviso. But I do not see what you add or what you gain by having a substantive provision at the beginning of the section in apparent conflict with the Military Establishment on that point.

Mr. DEWALT. There was a conflict in the Military Establishment as to when the soldier really became a soldier. At first, under the induction system, as we know, the party really did not get into the service of the Army, so far as physical service was concerned, until he was either taken away from his home or put into the camp and sent across the water. But afterwards the department did rule—and it is now so held, as I understand it—that from the moment he received his notice, or did receive his notice to appear, he was then actually a soldier in the service of the Army, and he was subject then to military discipline.

Now, the next question that arose was as to whether anything that occurred during the meantime was in the line of his duty. For instance, we had a question presented to us where a man was going toward the camp, but was not yet actually enrolled, and he was hurt on the train. I think this individual was killed on the train, if my recollection serves me aright, and the question arose then as to whether or not he was entitled to the benefits of the war-risk insurance act, and they ruled that he was not, because he was not actually enrolled. That ruling has been changed to include the men who are actually inducted into the service, whether they were enrolled or actually in the camp or not. In other words, he was considered to be in the line of duty, because he was in progress of going to the camp.

Mr. ROGERS. That I can entirely understand. But can the gentleman indicate what classes of cases would not be covered under the language which begins section 31; in other words, that first paragraph, exclusive of the proviso, establishes a negative. It says that after certain things have happened and until certain things have happened the soldier shall not be regarded as being in the military service within the meaning of this law. Wherein is that language of consequence?

Mr. DEWALT. None at all, I should think, as to the benefits of this act, because you must take it in connection with the proviso.

Mr. ROGERS. In other words, the real meat of it is in the proviso?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Some moments ago the gentleman nearly covered the question that I am going to ask of him. On the day that the armistice was declared, as we, of course, all know, many men were on their way to camp. I know of a particular instance where many men were recalled from the stations. It has been ruled by the department that these men are not entitled to the $60 bonus. Of course if that were the case they would naturally be in the same position with regard to this bill. But it would seem at least that if a man were hurt on the way or killed on the way he ought to be brought under this act.

Mr. DEWALT. I grant you that is so, but it has not been covered by this act, because this act contemplates only an extension to and including November 11, 1918. That is the date of the armistice.

Mr. SNYDER. Every one of these men who were called by the draft boards and sent toward the encampment considered that they were soldiers and in the service of the United States, and it seems to me they not only ought to be included in this bill, but they ought to have had the $60 bonus as well.

Mr. DEWALT. I think even under the provisions of this bill they would be entitled to take out insurance, and under the insurance feature of the bill they would consequently be entitled to compensation, and being entitled to insurance they could name beneficiaries, and their beneficiaries would be entitled, of course, to the benefits of the insurance, and they would also be entitled to the benefits of the compensation resultant upon that insurance and injury. But I am frank to say to the gentleman that the bill here contemplates only an extension to and including November 11, 1918.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. That is what I am here for. I am not here to make a speech, but to try to tell about the bill, and I confess there are many things about it that I do not know.

Mr. BEE. Referring to page 2 of the bill, section 3, subdivision (d)——

Mr. DEWALT. As to an illegitimate child?

Mr. BEE. Yes; but "as to the father only, if acknowledged by instrument in writing signed by him." Does that mean an acknowledged instrument or any writing by the father acknowledging the paternity of the child?

Mr. DEWALT. That would not mean an acknowledgment before a notary public of the fact; no. It is parallel to this, I will say to the gentleman from Texas: The toll of the statute of limitations in regard to a note may be in different ways. For instance, I owe you a note in the State of Pennsylvania, and the statutory limitation thereof is six years, and if you do not sue me within six years the presumption of payment arises.

Mr. BEE. By the statute of limitations, but not by an affirmative act?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. There may be, however, an acknowledgment of that debt which renews the same and gives you the privilege of suing. How is that acknowledgment made? It need not be an instrument of writing duly acknowledged by a justice of the peace or a notary public in which I say, "I hereby acknowledge that I owe Mr. BEE $500, and in witness whereof I set my hand and seal," and then have a notary say, "Taken and subscribed before me," but I can do it in another way. You can come to me and say, "Mr. DEWALT, here is your note for $500." I say, "Yes; that is my note, and I promise to pay." Or you need not come to me with the note. You may say, "Mr. DEWALT, I have a note of yours in my safe of $500. Can you pay it?" I may say, "I can not pay it now, but I will say to you, Mr. BEE, that I will pay that note, in amount $500, within six months, or six years from this time, and if not, identify the instrument there by date or amount and make the terms consistent with a promise to pay. That tolls the statute."

Now, here is an acknowledgment that this man owns the child by some writing.

Mr. BEE. Now suppose you had not written the letter to me, but had written it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], and had said to the gentleman from New York that you owed me the $500 and intended to pay it. That would revive it?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. It would revive it if the debt was acknowledged and the acknowledgment was consistent with a promise to pay.

Mr. BEE. We have in our State what is known as a common-law marriage, which has been recognized by the courts of our State.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I am trying as far as possible to protect the innocent woman who has been left in this position, with a child, while the man goes about his business. I wish to protect her against his escaping his responsibility. That is the reason I am interested in this clause, to know whether this instrument in writing means any writing, written to you or to me or to anybody else, without regard to the forms of law, wherein this man acknowledges that the child in question is his child.

Mr. DEWALT. That is precisely what it does mean.

Mr. BEE. In that instance this unfortunate person would be entitled to receive the war-risk benefits?

Mr. DEWALT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. McFADDEN. On page 2, section 4, I want to call attention to clause (4a), and to ask the gentleman whether or not the case which I cite is covered, and whether the insurance will be paid: A boy who enlisted and was killed in France was taken by his aunt on the day of his birth. He had always known her as his mother, but she never legally adopted him. The boy's own mother has released her claim, but the bureau refuses to pay. Is that covered in this clause?

Mr. DEWALT. The boy was killed?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Did he take out insurance?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; he took out insurance and made it payable to his aunt, whom he knew only as his mother.

Mr. DEWALT. Unfortunately in that case you have this situation: Before these amendments to this act are actually passed this aunt is not within the beneficiary class. Does the gentleman understand that?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The boy's own mother, of course, was in the beneficiary class. She could be designated as his beneficiary.

Mr. McFADDEN. But in this case she was not.

Mr. DEWALT. Anyone who occupied the position of loco parentis could be designated, and can now be designated. Now, if his aunt was actually his foster parent and reared him, then the law will be construed that she was occupying the place of his parent, unless he had a mother living at the time, and payments made to her subject to other provisions of this act.

Mr. McFADDEN. His mother is living now.

Mr. DEWALT. His actual mother is living now?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. That feature of the case is attempted to be met by the act in this way, that we now enlarge the beneficiary class by including those who stood in loco parentis; and if it is determined that that is an actual fact, then any amounts which have been prepaid or paid upon the insurance or by way of compensation to those who were actually designated, but did not occupy the position under the law, shall be considered as paid to them, and it can not be taken from them; but from the passage of this act, then the money shall be paid to the party who is designated as the one whom the soldier desires to have receive it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then in the case I have cited you think this clause covers it?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. That woman would get the money, although any payments already made to the mother would be gone and could not be recovered by the foster mother.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. In answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] a few moments ago, referring to this same subdivision (4a), on page 2, which reads:

And persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year——

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman from Maine to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that meant the year next preceding induction into the military service.

Mr. DEWALT. That was answered just a moment ago.

Mr. RUCKER. And the answer was in the affirmative—that it did?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, I am not quite satisfied with that construction of it, and if that be the correct construction of it, I am not satisfied with the provision of law. For instance, suppose a foster mother or father had raised a boy from infancy until he was 18 years of age, so that in the early part of the war he was below the draft age. For two years before the draft he had been permitted, by reason of the necessities of the family, to go out and work for himself, so that for a period of two years the boy was away from his foster mother's or father's home, earning his own livelihood. He saw fit to make that foster mother or father, as the case may be, the beneficiary of his policy. Ought not that foster mother or father to receive it?

Mr. DEWALT. I agree with the gentleman that that ought to be so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. I agree with you that as a matter of equity that should be done, but I think the judge will agree with me in saying that no general legislation can cover all specific cases. That would be in my judgment an extraordinary case, which would have to be met by a special bill.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. My notion about it is that in the administration of this law it will be construed to mean anyone who had acted as foster parent or been in that relation for a period of one year—not overnight but for the period of a year—notwithstanding there may have been an actual severance of those relations by separation for more than a year before entrance into the service; but I am afraid, the gentleman's analysis of the bill having very ably contributed to its formation, it might lead the bureau administering the law to place a wrong construction upon this section. I have so much respect for the gentleman's legal opinion myself that I am afraid the director of the bureau might have the same.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What does the bill provide in a case of this kind? A young man was drafted. He was engaged to be married in a few weeks but did not marry. He went into the service and was killed. He had taken out insurance in the name of his betrothed, but she is not within the list of the beneficiaries. His premium was deducted. Now, where does she stand?

Mr. DEWALT. We are going to try to cure that.

Mr. HULINGS. I have another case.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will wait until we consider the first. There is an amendment about to be proposed, I understand, when we come to the amendatory stage, that will take care of a case of that kind, to wit, where a young man was ready to be married, had designated his fiancée, and if such designation is made and the proof thereof submitted and she falls within the specifications as mentioned in the amendment, the insurance may be paid to her.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, here is another case, where a boy's mother died and his father was a drunken scamp; one of the neighbors took the boy at the age of 4, raised him as a member of her family until he went into the Army. He was killed. His foster mother, in whose name he had taken out insurance, calling her his mother but by a name different from his own, died. Now, there is a row among the whole outfit whether the brothers and sisters of the children of the foster mother or the worthless old daddy will come in for the insurance. Does this bill provide for a case of that kind?

Mr. DEWALT. It does. If the woman can establish by competent proof that she occupied the position of parent of that son, and that she was designated as the beneficiary, and can further prove the neglect of the father in taking care of his child, she will stand in the position of parent and will be entitled to the insurance.

Mr. HULINGS. In this case the War Risk Bureau has turned it down.

Mr. DEWALT. It could not do anything else under the existing law.

Mr. HULINGS. Can it turn it up again?

Mr. DEWALT. Of course, the payments that have already been made are inviolable, but in the future the payments can be made to the beneficiary.

Mr. HULINGS. There has been nothing paid yet.

Mr. DEWALT. Then we will not have to worry about that.

Mr. SNYDER. In the new section provided for in this act, section 31, it says:

Provided, That if after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person dies or becomes disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty and not due to his own willful misconduct, or as a result of the aggravation, in the line of duty and not because of his own willful misconduct, of an existing disease or injury, he or those entitled thereto shall receive the benefits of compensation payable under article 3.

Since the War Department has held that the man who left on the day of the armistice and was called back before inducted was not in the line of duty, is that a safe proposition? Will it leave it so that the man who did actually start and was returned before he was inducted, who got hurt or diseased or got killed—does this leave it so that he would come under the provisions?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think he would. I stated in response to the former question that these provisions are extended only to include the 11th of November, 1918.

Mr. SNYDER. This was on the 11th of November.

Mr. DEWALT. Then he would be included, because the law knows no fraction of a day.

Mr. SNYDER. I know of no individual case, but there must have been many of them on that day that should be taken care of.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I have this sort of a case, where a resident was summoned before the draft board, was not inducted, but ordered by the draft board to submit to a surgical operation. He was operated upon. He was never taken into the military service because of the result of the operation. Is there anything in the bill to take care of that man?

Mr. DEWALT. No; there is nothing in the bill that would. It would have to be by a special act.

Mr. RAYBURN. It seems to me that in the case mentioned by the gentleman from Missouri, if the local draft board was capable of ordering the man to have an operation, that he then would come under this act, because they could not order him to have the operation unless he was in the service.

Mr. DEWALT. I think that would be so, I will say in response to the gentleman from Texas, provided there had been an order of induction, but this act, like all other acts, must be construed strictly because it is beneficial and contemplates the payment of money. It is an insurance act and must be construed liberally in favor of the party who had the contract, but strictly as to the party that is to pay the money.

Now, this bill provides that there must be an induction, and therefore if a man was not inducted he could not come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. IGOE. He was not inducted, but the draft board exercised authority over the man. He had no option except to submit to the operation or go to jail.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the draft board had authority to order him onto the operating table, he was in the service. If it was entirely voluntary with him, it would be different; but if they had authority to say that he must subject himself to the operation, I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. DEWALT. I am sorry, but I would be obliged to disagree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] on the legal proposition.

Mr. RAYBURN. I doubt, of course, whether the draft board would have that authority.

Mr. DEWALT. As a legal proposition, I could not agree with the gentleman from Texas. He may be right.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I call the gentleman's attention to page 2 of the bill, section (4a). I do not think I understood the gentleman's explanation awhile ago as to the meaning of the last clause of that section:

And persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year.

Does that mean that if a boy went into a home of some family and lived there as a member of that family for only one year prior to his entrance into the Naval or Military Establishment, he would be a foster son?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARNS. It certainly reads that way, does it not?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. The term "loco parentis" is one which has a legal significance.

Mr. KEARNS. Absolutely so.

Mr. DEWALT. And is determined by the law itself.

Mr. KEARNS. I am not discussing what that term means. I am talking about the length of time. We can examine the dictionary and find out what the phrase means.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not know whether the gentleman could or not. He would have to examine the legal decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask the gentleman to yield me five additional minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five more minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman from Ohio will pardon me, I would say that I went over that very carefully, I think.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman went over it; but I am referring now entirely to the period of time of one year mentioned in the bill, and I ask the question again: If some boy should go into a family to live as a member of that family and had been there only one year and was then inducted into either the Military or Naval Establishment, would that boy then be considered the foster son of that family?

Mr. DEWALT. I answer negatively. Of course he would not be so considered. The mere fact that I live in the gentleman's family does not make me his foster son.

Mr. KEARNS. That is why I would like to have the gentleman explain that phraseology.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman, in the first place, concede this, that the term "loco parentis" in law has a significance which is determined by the law itself?

Mr. KEARNS. Oh, yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman have clearly in his mind what that significance is?

Mr. KEARNS. I think I have.

Mr. DEWALT. If he has that clearly in his mind, what is the relation and how is it established? It is not established by mere residence.

Mr. KEARNS. I understand that.

Mr. DEWALT. It is established by the fact that the individual has taken care of the foster son or of the party who is there residing with him.

Mr. KEARNS. For a period of one year?

Mr. DEWALT. No; this relationship must have been established for at least a year prior to that time. The reason for that was this: Under the term "insurance" as we had it—and this does not apply to converted insurance at all—there was a danger that a young man would designate you or me or somebody else as a foster parent for the mere purpose of having some one get the benefit of that insurance or compensation, and that was the thing that we tried to prevent at that time.

That emergency is now passed. The war is over, and we do not now have the term "insurance." We are now getting to what we call "converted insurance," and therefore we designate anyone within the class of beneficiaries to be made beneficiaries, because they pay pretty nearly the full rate of old-line insurance. And right in that connection permit me to say this: This converted insurance which this bill provides for is about 20 per cent less in price than the cheapest standard insurance company we have, to wit, the Travelers, and is about 30 per cent less in price than the Equitable or the Mutual, of New York.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Reverting for a brief question concerning section 31, take the case where a boy was inducted by a legal draft board the day before the armistice. He is waiting for the train to go to the nearest training camp. The armistice comes on, a celebration follows, and he is wounded in the celebration by an explosion which takes place, with which he had nothing to do, and is permanently injured.

Mr. DEWALT. He would be within the class. He is all right.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I do not want to be too technical about this "instrument in writing" with reference to illegitimate children, but an instrument in writing has a restricted meaning, such as a deed or a will. If it is intended that any writing by a father acknowledging the child is to entitle the child to the benefit, the word "instrument" limits it, because it is a limitation on the power.

Mr. DEWALT. When you have a legal term in an act, that legal term must be construed with regard to the tenor of the act itself and the purpose of the act itself. When you say that an instrument in writing, technically speaking, is confined to deeds and wills and other authenticated instruments, you are, generally speaking, correct, but you are not correct when you talk specifically.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I am afraid that I am trespassing upon the good nature of the gentleman from Texas, but it is not my fault. I yield.

Mr. HICKS. In regard to section 14. As I understand, the query as made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania with regard to paying this amount when those in the permitted classes were dead, in the case he mentioned of a fiancée. Do I understand an amendment is going to be offered to section 14 which would allow the soldier to designate someone besides those in the permitted class and that the amount would be paid to them and not to his estate?

Mr. DEWALT. No; the amendment as drawn will only permit such designation of the fiancée if there be no one surviving of the permitted class.

Mr. HICKS. It would not be paid to the soldier's estate?

Mr. DEWALT. No; it would not go to his estate, if this fiancée came within the designated class, under the illustration as named by the proposed amendment.

Mr. HICKS. And that will be an amendment to section 14?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not know where the amendment will be submitted, but there will be such an amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. Who are in the permitted class?

Mr. DEWALT. Fathers, mothers, stepfathers, stepmothers, uncles, aunts, foster parents, legitimate children, illegitimate children under certain restrictions, adopted children adopted under certain provisions.

Mr. KEARNS. Brothers and sisters?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; and nephews and nieces.

Mr. KEARNS. They would come in before a fiancée?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; before a fiancée. Permit me, in conclusion—and I must beg pardon, because I know I have been trespassing upon the good nature of the gentleman from Texas—I wish to make a few general remarks before I conclude, and I desire also to express my thanks to the gentlemen who have made the inquiries in regard to this bill. I have not only been entirely willing, but, in fact, very anxious that these inquiries should be made, and if I have not answered them satisfactorily it was not because I did not desire to do so, but it was perhaps from lack of definite and accurate knowledge upon the same, but I have done the best I could with the knowledge I had.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman has done very well.

Mr. DEWALT. Permit me to say one or two words in conclusion, and then I will have finished. I desire to impress the importance upon the membership of this committee of endeavoring to obtain as many as possible of their constitutents who are soldiers to continue their insurance and to take out converted insurance. My reasons for saying that are these:

The statistics show that a very large per cent of the insurance that was contracted for, known as war-term insurance, is gradually being lapsed by those who took it out. The Secretary of the Treasury has extended the time for a period of 18 months, I think, during which time any soldier can reinstate himself and renew the insurance, but there should be an effort made by every Member of Congress who has the interest of these boys at heart to convince them that it is for their material interest and for the interest of their fathers and mothers——

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DEWALT. I can not be interrupted now—and for the interest of those who succeed them that this insurance should be converted as speedily as possible if they are able to do it financially. Why? The actuary of the Department, Mr. McFarlane, in response to questions, said that it was shown that insurance under the conversion plan would be at least 20 per cent less in price for any stated age than the cheapest standard insurance company that has ever existed, to wit, the Travelers Insurance, and that it will be at least 30 per cent less in price to the insured than any of the standard insurance companies now doing business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I am sorry; I desired to have yielded to the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 42 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa 34 minutes.

Mr. SWEET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion to follow closely war-risk insurance legislation. In my opinion the rules of the House should be changed so as to provide for a committee on war-risk insurance. The work is too great to be placed on a subcommittee of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The work will increase. No one can glance at the pending measure, which consists of many amendments to the original crude and imperfect war-risk insurance act and fail to see that the subcommittee has worked long and hard, and I desire to congratulate the members of that subcommittee. Their work is an answer to the query so often made in the newspapers and sometimes made by Members on this floor, "What is Congress doing?" Invariably the reply is, "Congress is talking and quarreling; carrying on political sham battles; Members not in their seats," and so on. But, as a matter of fact, the Members of Congress work right along day in and day out. All committees have work to do, and time must be found in which to do that work. Every time charges are made that Members of Congress are not in attendance we know that the Members on these committees are at work and working hard producing just such bills as this.

This measure, containing 28 or 30 important sections, did not come together out of thin air. It represents study and labor and the development of ideas which came, perhaps, from a constituent of this Congressman or that Congressman. For instance, two of the paragraphs embrace bills introduced by that hard-working Member of Congress, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]. Both are highly important. The subcommittee has done me the honor to include in this measure two resolutions which I introduced. One of these grew out of the loss of the Navy collier Cyclops, which sailed away in January, 1918, and has never been heard of from that day to this. Less than one-third of the crew of that ship carried war-risk insurance. They had had no opportunity to take out insurance. This bill covers that and all cases where soldiers and sailors died from the date of our entry into the war until the date of the armistice, unless those soldiers and sailors had stated specifically in writing that they did not desire governmental insurance.

I like the method adopted by this subcommittee, which makes for true constructive legislation. The subcommittee called before it all Members who had introduced a bill or a resolution to amend in any way the war-risk insurance act and secured their views.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this seemingly is a good speech, and I think it ought to be heard by more than the few men present, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; do not let us call other gentlemen away from their work on committees.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman must not camouflage them with gas excuses, as few committees meet in the afternoon. I thought the gentleman wanted to be heard——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can get along without a larger audience than we have.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman does not desire to have a better audience, I withdraw the point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, as soon as this bill is on its way to another body for its final passage this very subcommittee will have to go back into its committee room and work upon further amendments to the war-risk insurance act. That act was passed necessarily in haste, and no one pretends that it is perfect. While the amendments now proposed are good, they do not go far enough. If you wish the soldiers to keep up their insurance policies, you will have to modify the terms. I am still of the opinion that divisional agencies should be established. I think that notices of premiums due should be sent to all. I think that receipts for premiums paid should be on printed blanks and not on the little mimeographed blanks now being used, which fail to show the month for which the premium was paid. It may be advisable to fix a lower maximum of insurance, and in cases where a reduction is effected give to the soldier, cash in hand, the surrender value of the excess over and above the maximum for which he has paid. I hope to be able to present a bill carrying a surrender plan.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I can not yield now.

Mr. Chairman, I did not make public criticisms of the War Risk Insurance Bureau in time of its extremity. We heard them on every hand, our offices were filled with complaints, and all of us knew that bureau was staggering under a tremendous burden. But true criticisms, my friends, were written in the form of bills or resolutions properly introduced and then referred to this hard-working committee, which promptly sent for the author and asked him to elaborate his views. I would like to see more of that kind of work done by the committees of Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the House and the committee on the attendance here and the very respectful attention given to the gentlemen who have given us an analysis of the bill now pending.

The war recently closed cast a shadow of gloom into many homes throughout the land. Sorrows are there which the flight of years can not efface. There are in the homes of this country, once happy and bright, many vacant chairs. We could not prevent that condition, because when war was declared everybody understood the hazards and dangers which had to be met by the brave boys of our land. But Congress has, in my opinion, done all that it could do to alleviate sorrow and to remove the distress, as far as could be, consequent upon the ravages of cruel war.

This bill proposes to amend the war-risk insurance act in its several branches by increased compensation and making more liberal the provisions with reference to insurance. I especially commend the committee for the generous and liberal provisions of compensation carried in this bill for those who have been disabled in the war. When I recall that a few years ago our own land was blighted by a great Civil War among our own people, and think of the wrongs that have been imposed upon the old soldiers of the Civil War in comparison with the humane and generous provisions of this bill, it looks as if every man here ought to arouse himself to do something more for the surviving veterans of that great army whose personal sacrifices preserved this great Nation which furnished the boys who fought and won the war across the sea. [Applause.] Here we make generous provisions for disabled men. I have now a bill pending before the Invalid Pension Committee of this House to grant an increase of pension to a soldier in my district who suffered an injury, described in this bill—the loss of a foot. The amount under the old pension law is wholly inadequate, judged by this law, and this law has my full approbation and approval.

Let me say to you that I am most glad and will most cheerfully vote for each and every provision of this bill. It will cast sunshine and hope across the threshold of many homes throughout the land; it will give joy and comfort to mothers and to wives and children who have lost sons and husbands and fathers. I congratulate you, I say again, upon the splendid courage manifested by the committee in bringing to the floor of the House and giving us a chance to vote upon a bill so generous and so humane in all of its provisions. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I intend, if I can get recognition, to offer four amendments to the pending bill, which, for the information of the House, I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

First amendment: On page 12, after the word "regulations," on line 11, add the following as a new section:

"The term insurance in force on the life of every commissioned officer, enlisted man, and member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps (female) on the date he leaves the active military or naval service, shall be continued in force for two years after the end of the calendar month in which he is separated from the active service without the payment of premiums by the insured: Provided, however, That in the case of persons who are or have been so separated from the service and who have paid their premiums after being so separated the period of two years herein provided shall begin to run on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the passage of this act, or on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the month for which the premium was last paid, whichever date is the earlier: Provided further, That every person who converts or has converted his term insurance before the expiration of the two-year period herein provided shall during such period or remainder thereof be entitled to a monthly credit on his premium for converted insurance equivalent to what the monthly premium on his term insurance would have been during the said two-year period if he had not converted it and if this amendatory act had not been passed."

Second amendment: On page 16, line 7, after the word "persons," add the following as a new section:

"That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall make provision by regulations for the payment at the maturity, by death of the insured, of the yearly renewable term insurance granted under article 4 of the war-risk insurance act at the option of the insured in installments for 36 months or more."

Third amendment: Also the following amendment at the end of the bill:

"That the rate fixed and in force upon the 1st day of August, 1919, on the war-risk insurance policy taken out by any commissioned officer, enlisted man, or other person shall remain in force and not be changed or increased unless the insured shall convert his insurance into some other form of policy, as provided by regulations authorized under section 404 of the act approved September 2, 1914."

Fourth amendment: Also the following amendment at the end of the bill:

"That when any officer or enlisted man or person insured under the provisions of this act shall have reached the age of 64 years, or as soon thereafter as he shall have paid the premiums for 15 years, shall not be required to make further payments on his policy, but his insurance shall remain in full force and effect."

Mr. McCULLOCH. On January 15, 1919, I introduced a bill providing that all officers and enlisted men of the land and naval forces of the United States should be relieved from the payment of premiums on policies of insurance issued by the War Risk Insurance Bureau for a period of two years. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], who has charge of this bill upon the floor, introduced a bill on August 5, 1919, containing a provision continuing in force policies for two years without the payment of premiums by the insured.

An examination of the bill before the House and the original bill introduced by Mr. SWEET, which contained the provision I have referred to, indicates that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce approved Mr. SWEET's bill with the exception of this section, which was stricken from the bill as reported by the committee.

First amendment: The effect of the first amendment, if adopted, will be to continue in force without expense to the soldier, whether his policy has lapsed or not, his insurance for a period of two years. In presenting this matter for the serious consideration of the House I feel that I should approach it from two different standpoints—first, the moral obligation of the Government to continue this insurance for a reasonable time in order to permit the soldier to readjust himself and get his affairs in such condition that he can afford to meet the premiums on the insurance and carry it, and, second, from the standpoint of the cost of this proposal to the Government, should it be adopted.

On the first proposition I think it is fair to say that the war-risk insurance idea was conceived as much, if not more, for the purpose of protecting the Government as the soldier. While the law did not require a soldier to take out the insurance, yet at the time of entering the service all soldiers, sailors, and marines were asked, urged, and practically required to take war-risk insurance, which they did with rare exceptions. Each month during their service they have had deducted from their pay the premiums on this insurance. Now comes the time of discharge. The soldier is dropped from the pay roll. He is in many cases in poor health, out of employment, with dependents to support, and an array of various and varying conditions confront him. The result has been that the soldier finds it impossible to meet the conditions, and he drops his insurance. It has been estimated that 90 per cent of them have dropped their insurance. The Hughes report, which is printed in volume 2 of the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, says:

It is regrettable to know that approximately three-fourths of the holders of existing policies have not continued their payments.

It is clear that the Hughes investigating committee would not state the amount of lapsed policies too high and would be conservative in their estimate, but considering the situation from the standpoint of their estimate, it is an exceedingly serious one that three-fourths of the soldiers who have taken out policies of insurance, since they have been off of the pay roll have either dropped their insurance or permitted their policies to lapse. Another statement in the Hughes report is worthy of consideration in connection with the amendment I have proposed. It says:

One difficulty of paramount importance at this moment lies in the fact that about 30 per cent of the addresses of discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines are found to be incorrect and consequently notices are returned and the bureau has found itself unable to communicate with this large proportion of those for whose benefit the bureau was established. This, of course, must be immediately rectified and correct addresses secured.

It is apparent from the statements contained in the Hughes report which I have quoted that not only the soldier is compelled by reason of conditions that confront him, to drop his insurance or to permit it to lapse, or elects to do so, but that the bureau is in a chaotic condition and it will take time for both the soldier and the department to readjust themselves and get upon a basis whereby the law can be administered in a proper manner.

If the amendment I propose to this bill is adopted, it will give the bureau time to readjust itself and it will give the soldier a chance to get established in business or profession and in shape to carry his policy if he sees fit to do so or have it converted as the law provides.

On the question of cost, which many members may regard as of vital importance, I have figured out that the cost to the Government would be comparatively small. The average policy of insurance, as shown by the records of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is about $9,000. Most of the soldiers took out $10,000 policies but some took a less amount which brought the average down to about $9,000. It is estimated upon the basis of American expert tables of mortality that about seven in every thousand of persons who hold policies of insurance die during a year. It is apparent that in the case of soldiers who are expected to be the best physical specimens in the world and whose ages range between 21 and 31, this ratio of deaths as determined by the mortality tables of old-line insurance companies, would be much less. If 4,000,000 men held insurance policies of $9,000 each, the death claims upon the 7 to 1,000 ratio would amount to about $252,000,000 in one year, which, of course, under the present law would be paid in 240 monthly installments or covering a period of 20 years—if my amendment is adopted in 36 months or three years.

It developed during the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, which were held January 30, 1919, that there had been deducted from the pay of soldiers up to that time amounts totaling about $200,000,000. I quote the following testimony of Mr. MacFarlane:

Mr. BYRNES. With reference to the insurance feature, what is the amount of the premiums you have collected as the result of insurance contracts?

Mr. MACFARLANE. It is estimated that the amount of premiums deducted from the pay of soldiers to date—January 30, 1919—amounts to about $200,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. Has that been turned over to you?

Mr. MACFARLANE. No, sir; that is still in the hands of the War and Navy Departments.

It has been estimated by the actuary of the War Risk Bureau that since January 30, 1919, premiums have been deducted from the pay of soldiers and premiums have been paid in by discharged soldiers which would bring the total amount collected up to about $300,000,000 at the present time. So that there is now in the Treasury of the United States $300,000,000 of money practically all of which has been taken from the pay of soldiers and which is available for the conduct of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. That is not the Government's money, but it is money that belongs to the soldier, and was taken out of his pay for this specific purpose, and to guarantee him future benefits. Using the figures contained in the Hughes report that three-fourths of the policies of insurance have lapsed, $225,000,000 of the $300,000,000 is money paid in by soldiers who, unless they renew their policies, will secure absolutely no future benefit from this insurance. True, the soldier was protected while he was in the service, but had he been injured while in the service the moral and legal obligation of the Government would have been such that the Congress would have taken care of the soldier by pension compensation or in some other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, could I have a little more time?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. SWEET. Then I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, we have not only the moral obligation, but section 403 of the war-risk act specifically makes it a legal obligation. Section 403 provides:

That the United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war.

It was not expected or intended by Congress that the premiums paid in by the soldiers should take care of the extraordinary hazards of war. So that in truth and in fact the soldiers who paid in this $225,000,000 whose policies have lapsed and who paid this money in largely under compulsion while in the service will receive no future benefit whatsoever to themselves for the money they have paid to the Government. If the Government keeps this money and gives the soldier no future benefit for it, the Government will be in the attitude of taking from the soldiers of the Republic $225,000,000 which is rightfully theirs. So that we are confronted at this hour with the necessity of either adopting my amendment, which will give the soldier some future benefit for the money that has been taken from him in the way of protection after he is out of the service and when the obligation of the Government has ceased, or it is the duty of Congress to pay that money back to the soldiers who paid it into the Treasury. [Applause.]

If my amendment is adopted, it will effect another material saving. According to the testimony before the Appropriations Committee, there are now employed in the War Risk Insurance Bureau in Washington about 14,000 people. It has been estimated that if this amendment is adopted the work can be done by not to exceed 4,000 people, which would effect a saving of millions of dollars, for the reason that it is estimated that it will take $23,000,000 to run the bureau next year, and if the number of employees were reduced to 4,000, 10,000 being eliminated, the saving on the salary roll would be very material.

The employees retained would have the time to list up the soldiers, correct the addresses, and some time before the expiration of the two-year period the soldiers could be notified of the necessity of resuming their premium payments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I would like to finish my statement.

Mr. SWEET. How long will it take the gentleman to do so?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I will finish in three minutes.

Mr. SWEET. All right; I yield three minutes more.

Mr. McCULLOCH. It has been suggested that in addition to the Washington bureau it will be necessary to establish bureaus in the various States, and if this is done, the cost of operating the bureau will run millions of dollars in excess of the $23,000,000 estimated for next year. If my amendment is adopted, the necessity for any such plan would be eliminated.

Second amendment. I have heard many complaints by soldiers and beneficiaries in regard to the system of payments in the event of death or disability. It is very unsatisfactory and, in my judgment, unjust to limit the beneficiary and then not make payment in lump sum, but covering a period of 20 years, or 240 monthly payments. I believe that the insurance should be paid in a lump sum and finally be settled, and that the restrictions in regard to beneficiaries should be removed. It is altogether probable and, I think, a fact that a great many of the policies have been dropped because of the method of payment.

However, as a compromise between the lump-sum payment and the payment as now made in 240 installments, I have incorporated in my amendment a proviso that payments shall be made in 36 monthly installments. This will enable the beneficiary to secure the full amount within a reasonable time.

I understand, in that connection, that that proviso for 36 payments, or the payment of the loss in case of death in 36 monthly installments or more, at the option of the insured, met the approval of the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman is right.

Mr. McCULLOCH. And he made such suggestion to the committee, but it was rejected by the general committee, and the provision continued that the insurance should be paid in 240 monthly installments.

Now, I am satisfied that there is serious objection upon the part of soldiers to this insurance, as the law now stands. They are dropping the insurance, not only because they can not meet the payments but they are dropping it because they regard it as not attractive, and whatever you may say about it, the very fact that more than three-fourths of the policies of the insurance have been permitted to lapse and the men have given them up, proves beyond any doubt that this proposition up to date has been a failure. So that if Congress is going to make it a success these policies of insurance must be made attractive. If we are going to continue to do something for the soldier along the line of insurance, if the idea of Congress is to help him, we have got to make these policies attractive, and we can make them attractive in one way by providing for payment in 36 monthly installments or more, at the option of the insured, instead of 240. They can be made attractive in regard to the proviso for old age, so that the soldier, if he reaches the age of 64, will not have to pay any more premiums. Think of the veterans of the Civil War being called upon to pay insurance premiums instead of receiving the pensions that they are receiving to-day; and where would most of them be? This proviso that the soldiers will not have to pay after they reach the age of 64 years will make the policies still more attractive.

There has been a great deal of discussion on the floor of the House about the obligation the world owes the American soldier. There can be no doubt about that obligation. Hardly a Member speaks upon this floor upon any patriotic subject that he does not laud our soldiers for the great part they took in the World War, expressing the highest praise for their heroism and the great sacrifices they have made. But when it comes to doing something for the soldier that is material, that will really benefit him, my observation has been that while everybody is willing to talk favorably, yet there is seldom any favorable action.

The truth is the American soldier not only made the great sacrifice, left his business and entered the Army and gave his time at $30 per month, but he paid his own way largely. The allotments he made for his dependents were taken out of his pay. And, according to the hundreds of complaints and letters that were printed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Bureau of War Risk Insurance held the pay of many soldiers for months and months while they were investigating whether they would add to it a family allowance. The Government was splitting straws on the question of family allowances, while the dependents in many instances were suffering and were objects of charity.

On the matter of war-risk insurance, all the Government pretended to do was to pay the overhead expenses and the hazards of war by way of compensation, and the soldier out of his pay carried all the rest. Not only the allotments came out of his pay but the insurance came out of his pay, so that in truth and in fact the American soldier has been carrying the burden of both his insurance and the allotments, and all he has received from the Government has been that the Government has taken care of overhead expenses, the compensation, and in some instances accorded family allowances.

We appropriated a hundred million of dollars to feed the starving in Europe. We appropriated millions of dollars to take care of incomplete contracts and to validify them and to protect manufacturers and business men who had entered upon war work. Everybody seems to be protected in a material way who had anything to do with this war except the American soldier, and it is time something material is done for him.

Our soldiers do not need nor do they want, I am sure, charity, but they are entitled to justice, real substantial justice. Congress should deal fairly with them, for they deserve it more than any other set of men in the Republic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has 38 minutes remaining.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, during the progress of the war which continued for more than four years it cost all of the countries involved about $186,000,000,000. The Central Powers and their allies expended of this sum about $63,000,000,000. The United States spent to April 30, 1919, $21,294,000,000 and loaned the Allies about $9,000,000,000. Only three countries spent more than the United States, namely, Germany, the British Empire, and France. The Civil War cost only $4,700,000,000.

There was almost 10,000,000 killed in battle during the recent war, including those who died of wounds. England's killed and crippled amounted to 3,000,000, leaving 2,000,000 widows and 5,000,000 orphans.

The United States lost 48,525 on the battle field, including those who died of wounds. The loss of life on both sides in the Civil War only amounted to about 200,000.

Deaths in the United States Army to September 5, 1919, were as follows:

American Expeditionary Forces.

Killed in action (including 382 at sea)	34,568
Died of wounds	13,957
Died of diseases	23,653
Died of accident and other causes	5,281
In United States camps, etc.
Died of diseases	34,368
Died of injury, etc.	1,982
Total	113,809

Deaths on the field of battle, divided among the other principal belligerents, were as follows:

Russia, 1,700,000; Germany, 1,600,000; France, 1,385,000; Great Britain, 900,000; Austria, 800,000; Italy, 364,800.

In the Franco-Prussian War the loss of life is estimated at 81,000 and the estimated cost was $2,534,000,000. One hundred and twenty-nine thousand seven hundred men were killed in the Russo-Japanese War, and it cost $2,500,000,000.

At the date of signing of the armistice the United States Army, exclusive of marines, amounted to 188,434 officers and 3,482,454 men, and at that time we had sent abroad 2,071,463 officers and men, including marines, nurses, and field clerks.

There sleep to-day under the sod of France more than 50,000 American boys who made the supreme sacrifice, and more than that number have been buried in the United States.

To-day there are more than 100,000 lonely homes in this country. I wish I could lay a flower at the feet of every mother whose son failed to return. All honor to these mothers who brought into the world these heroes.

There are over 200,000 more who are maimed, crippled, and blind. They are the subjects of our compassion and care.

When we consider the many billions of dollars spent, the many millions of lives lost, the number of cripples and the number of widows and orphan children left, the heartaches and sadness as a direct result of this terrible war it is difficult to conceive how anyone could oppose the league of nations. If there had been such a league at the time of the commencement of the recent World War I do not believe there would have been any war. [Applause.]

If Germany had known that the nations were going to oppose her that did, or had even realized that the British Empire would enter the war, I do not believe there would have been any war.

One of the things of the greatest importance to the American people at this time and that will bring much relief is the ratification of the peace treaty and league of nations. Everything is in an unsettled condition. As President Wilson said in his last message to Congress, "There is now neither peace nor war."

It is not claimed by the friends of the league of nations that if it is adopted there will be no more wars, but that it will be the means of a settlement of most international disputes without war. With the right to withdraw there is no danger of the surrender of the rights of the American people. Its object is to prevent wars and bring about a reduction of armament and military and naval programs.

We have paid less than one-third of the cost of the war and issued and sold bonds for the balance. These bonds and the interest thereon must be paid by taxes collected from the people. Taxes will be heavy enough during this and the next generation without having to maintain a large Army and Navy.

With the league of nations disarmament will follow. Without it each nation will strive to have the greatest army and navy, thereby increasing the burden of taxes and at the same time creating and encouraging a military spirit, making more wars a certainty.

I would like to pursue this subject further, but can not at this time on account of the limited time allotted me.

The war-risk insurance and compensation act of Congress is one of the best and most humane provisions of law that was ever enacted by any lawmaking body. No other nation made as good and generous provision for her soldiers and their dependents as did the United States. No other nation has ever provided Government life insurance for her soldiers in time of war. We made provision for Government life insurance for as much as $10,000 and at a lower premium rate than that of the old life insurance companies in peace times.

The War Risk Bureau is now the largest bureau of the Government. It has about 13,500 employees in Washington. There was about $550,000,000 paid through this bureau last year. The Government's liability for insurance through this bureau is more than $39,000,000,000.

The amendments to the war-risk insurance law, as proposed in the pending bill, has been found necessary in order that justice may be done to all concerned. They are generous and, I believe, will meet with the approval of the American people if enacted into law. They will, among other things, enable our soldiers to convert their insurance into term insurance of different kinds, at least 20 per cent cheaper than the old life insurance companies. It authorizes additional compensation in certain cases, and the payment of insurance in some cases not provided by the original law.

During the war I supported and voted for every law necessary to make the very best provision for the care and support of the soldiers and their dependents. We must do full justice to the dependents of those who lost their lives while in the service and to those who have received injuries or contracted diseases while in the service, and also to their dependents. [Applause.]

They have been given and should continue to be given the very best hospital treatment, and also receive training at the Government vocational training schools at the expense of the Government.

Most of our crippled soldiers are unable to discharge the duties they were accustomed to before they entered the service. The object of the vocational training schools is to prepare them for some employment for which their present condition is suited. They will thereby not only be made happier and more contented, but will be able to contribute something at least to the comfort and support of themselves and their dependents. These crippled and helpless soldiers of ours will always be the favored wards of our Government and our people. [Applause.]

The American people have just cause to be proud of the patriotism and service rendered during the war by all of our people. Both men and women contributed in various ways to the successful prosecution of the war, all of which was indispensable.

We also have just cause to be proud of the administration of our War Department by Secretary Newton D. Baker and those under him in that department. No other Secretary of War ever had such a stupendous undertaking. No one, in my opinion, could have administered the affairs of that department during the war with more business and statesman-like manner than did Secretary Baker.

I have but little patience with those who are spending so much time trying to find where there was some waste and extravagance and find fault about the cost of the war. Everybody knows that war is expensive, and there is always more or less waste and extravagance. War conditions make it inevitable. Our people were more concerned about winning the war as quickly as possible and stopping the bloodshed than they were about the money that was being spent. They are now more interested in Congress giving its time to real constructive peace-time legislation than they are in investigations of expenses of the War Department.

More was accomplished by our War Department toward raising, training, and transporting an army to foreign countries in one year than any other nation did in three years.

Our armies reached the battle fields of France at a critical time, just in time to save the situation and turn the tide, which resulted in the winning of the war and saving the civilization of the world. [Applause.]

Our soldiers by their efficiency and courage during the recent war made a record which reflects much credit upon themselves and their country, and which won the admiration of all the nations of the world. Their memories will live unto the end of time in the hearts and gratitude of the American people.

There was not a dead American soldier found on the battle fields of France with his back to the enemy. The American soldier never retreated and is without a peer in the annals of warfare.

We intrusted to their keeping the flag of our country, and they brought it back tattered and torn, but without a stain on its folds. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I ask unanimous consent that an amendment be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent to have read in his time an amendment pending before the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration to amend the war-risk insurance law is of great importance and should be passed without delay. While the original legislation enacted for the benefit of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the great World War, and their dependents and beneficiaries, has proven of real value, in its administration, however, in some respects it has not been broad enough to cover many cases which experience has shown should be covered.

It is also apparent that the original amount fixed for disabilities is insufficient and should be increased, and in many respects the law should be amended and broadened.

I am pleased to note that the committee has gone into this subject quite thoroughly, and has presented a bill broadening the scope of this legislation and greatly improving its provisions.

While much dissatisfaction has been found with the administration of this law, and while this law has not been administered as I believe it should have been, it has accomplished a great purpose, and the beneficiaries of this legislation have greatly benefited by its provisions; and while the amendments in this bill will not cure all the defects in the law which should be cured, the amendments will make the insurance more attractive to those for whom it was intended.

This legislation was enacted specially for the benefit of the soldiers, sailors, and marines, their dependents and beneficiaries, but we are advised that many of them dropped the insurance immediately upon being released from the service, and I apprehend that in many cases those who have dropped the insurance will be unable, by reason of physical defects or otherwise, to take other insurance.

As evidence of the situation relative to discontinuing this insurance, I desire to read from the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the consideration of this bill. On page 101 of these hearings I read from a statement of Charles E. Hughes, dated July 17, 1919. This statement is as follows:

It is regrettable to note that approximately three-fourths of the holders of existing policies have not continued their payments, and it is highly important that during the period allowed for reinstatement every effort should be made to bring home to our soldiers, sailors, and marines the importance of continuing their insurance, which has behind it the obligation of the United States, and thus to secure to the full the advantages which it was the intention of Congress that they should enjoy.

This is an appalling statement, and, coming from this source, I take it we may accept it as approximately correct.

Congress enacted this legislation for the benefit of those who laid aside their usual occupations and went to war, and I believe this insurance should be kept up, and I believe we owe it to these men to see to it that this insurance is kept up. They have rendered a service to their country which can not be measured, but we can do an act of justice by remitting these premiums for a short time.

I desire, therefore, to offer an amendment to this bill making provision for the continuing in force of this insurance of all soldiers, sailors, and marines for a period without the payment of premiums by the insured. I believe this will not only help many to continue this insurance permanently who otherwise would not be able to do so, but it will be an act of justice for the splendid services these boys have rendered to their country and to mankind.

I ask the Clerk to read the following amendment in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 16, following section 19, add a new section to be known as section 20:

"SEC. 20. That section 404 of the War Risk Insurance act is hereby amended by adding thereto as a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"'The term insurance in force on the life of every commissioned officer, enlisted man, and member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps (female) on the date he leaves the active military or naval service shall be continued in force for two years after the end of the calendar month in which he is separated from the active service without the payment of premiums by the insured: Provided, however, That in the case of persons who are or have been so separated from the service and who have paid their premiums after being so separated the period of two years herein provided shall begin to run on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the passage of this act or on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the month for which the premium was last paid, whichever date is the earlier: Provided further, That every person who converts or has converted his term insurance before the expiration of the two-year period herein provided shall during such period or remainder thereof be entitled to a monthly credit on his premium for converted insurance equivalent to what the monthly premium on his term insurance would have been during the said two-year period if he had not converted it and if this amendatory act had not been passed.'"

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. I am not quite clear from the reading of that amendment whether or not these policies, three-quarters of which I understand have lapsed, would be automatically revived if this amendment were carried.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; they would.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. The language of the gentleman's amendment, as I understand it, is exactly the language that was contained in the Sweet bill?

Mr. DOWELL. Except that one clause was stricken out; but the language, so far as it applies to extending the insurance, is the exact language of the Sweet bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield some of his time now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has 31 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. SWEET. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I can deal with only one feature of this admirable bill in the very brief time allotted to me, and that is the compensation feature.

Members of the House will remember that in the original war risk act of 1917 total disability was given compensation at the rate of $30 a month. I think if we look back at that time and recall that the membership of this House and of Congress agreed that $30 a month was an adequate compensation for total disability, we must be startled at the poor judgment then expressed by the Congress. Thirty dollars a month for total disability was in the judgment of Congress sufficient for a grateful Nation to pay the totally disabled soldier! Strangely enough that is still the law. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] in May last introduced a bill, which is the foundation of this portion of the present bill, in which he recommended distinguishing between compensation for total permanent disability and for total temporary disability. He provided that for total permanent disability the rate should be $100 a month, and that for total temporary disability there should be a base rate of $65 a month for a single man, with larger sums for men with dependents. That distinction then seemed to me, and still seems, unsound.

Then Congress in July enacted the vocational-educational supplement which contained this language:

In no event shall the sum so paid such person while pursuing such course—

That being the course of vocational instruction—

be more than $80 per month for a single man without dependents, or for a man with dependents $100 a month, plus the several sums prescribed as family allowances.

It seemed to me that that act of July 11, 1919, established, as far as Congress was then able to establish it, the principle that we should give very much more liberal compensation in cases of total disability, irrespective of whether that disability was temporary or permanent. In other words, the argument is that during the period of the total disability a temporarily disabled man needs just as much money for his support as if that disability were permanent. Therefore, early in August I introduced a bill—H. R. 8158—which established the vocational education rates for total disability, namely, $80 a month for a single man without dependents, and $100 a month for a man with dependents, and which made only a slight distinction between rates for temporary disability and for permanent disability, the latter receiving, irrespective of dependency, $100 a month. I think there was general agreement at the War Risk Insurance Bureau and in Congress that the rate of the bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] for total permanent disability, namely, $100 a month, was correct, and that the only issue at that time was whether there should not be more adequate compensation than his suggestion of $65 for total temporary disability. My bill, with all others before the subcommittee of Mr. SWEET, was very carefully considered by the committee, as I happen to know. I am glad to observe that in the bill which is now before the House a fairly adequate provision is made, not only for total permanent disability but also for total temporary disability. Substantially the rates proposed by my bill for the latter are carried in this bill, namely, a sliding scale based on $80 a month and working up to $100 a month for a man with dependents. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD generally, and also by printing a letter which has been sent me from a neighbor of mine on this general subject. The letter is about two pages in length.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. The disabled soldier is in the highest and truest sense the especial ward of the Nation. We must keep him from poverty and want. We must extend to him the hand of helpfulness. We must assist him in every way to overcome as far as possible the effects of his disability. In doing this we are discharging a double duty—the duty to show to him the Nation's gratitude, and the duty to the Nation to make him a useful citizen. This bill represents an enlightened determination to meet the Nation's obligation.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL,
Portland, Me., August 4, 1919.

Hon. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I want to thank you for your interest in the men who are now under the care of the War Risk Bureau.

Having served something like 38 weeks in war-risk hospitals, I feel that the experience I have gained might be of some interest to you, to the end that the Congress may be induced to do something for a class of men who at this time very much need both help and encouragement.

Before the armistice was signed it was the policy of the War Department to discharge men from the service who had become physically unfit for military duty. This was because new men were being called in the draft, the hospitals were overcrowded, and it was physically impossible to take care of all the disabled.

I was discharged from the service in September, 1918, and since then I have been under the care of the War Risk Bureau. I am a lawyer by profession, have served as a district attorney, and when I entered the Army I was earning about $3,500 a year, but like most young men I saved very little of it, and in fact I was in debt when I closed my office. Having graduated at a reputable military college, I was commissioned a captain of Cavalry. After securing my commission I asked permission and recruited at my own expense a whole military organization. The four years I had spent in the military college enabled me to very quickly whip this organization into good shape. After I had gotten my troop in good shape it was broken up and I was transferred to the Field Artillery and assigned to a regiment that had been in Federal service nearly two years. When I was assigned to this regiment all of the schools were far advanced, and in addition to preparing my lessons I had to go back and cover the work that had been done in these schools prior to my assignment. In other words, it was like sitting a man down to study algebra at quadratic equations. I, of course, did not want to be put out of the Army for inefficiency and I went hard down to work, the result being that I had a complete nervous breakdown. I was discharged from the service as "temporarily total disability." Since my discharge I have drawn $30 per month from the War Risk Bureau, which has just about sufficed for laundry bills, cigars, etc. It had cost me about $700 to recruit the troop of Cavalry, besides the four months of my time, and when I was discharged I had saved very little of my salary. What money I did save I have spent, and when I leave this hospital, as I intend to do very soon, it will be with an empty pocket.

If my disability had occurred before the signing of the armistice I would have been held in the service until such a time as I was able to go out and take care of myself, and my salary as an officer would have continued. After the signing of the armistice the policy of the War Department was not to discharge any officer or enlisted man until all that could be done for him had been done. I have a friend who is now and has been in one of the base hospitals for several months. He has a slight disability, but he tells me that he will not be discharged until he has been cured. As a matter of course he draws his pay. Probably you have noticed in the papers that American officers are attending the various colleges of England and France. These officers are in good health, but the necessity for discharging them was not pressing, and since last November they have been sent to these colleges, and while there they draw their pay as officers of the Army. I have no criticism to offer of this, but I do say that the officers and enlisted men who went into the Army in the early part of 1917, became disabled and were discharged from the service before completing their medical treatment, and who since then have been in war-risk hospitals ought to be entitled to some consideration, and in fairness to them I want to ask you, in the event Congress raises the compensation, to make the raise retroactive and date back to the date on which the war-risk act became effective.

Another thing I want to call to your attention is that an officer who is undergoing vocational training draws the same pay that he drew the last month he was in service, while a single officer in a war-risk hospital whose disability is such that he can not take up vocational training draws a maximum of $30 per month. I think the vocational-training act is a fine law. It is the last hope of the reserve and National Guard officers. But how about the officer who is either unable to take this training or who does not care to change his vocation? In other words, the man who is on his feet gets the same pay that he received the last month he served in the Army and the officer who is temporarily totally disabled draws the $30. I submit that the officer who has been in war-risk hospitals and who has been unable to go out into the world should receive the same pay that a soldier receives who is undergoing training, and the law should be retroactive and date back to take in those who were discharged last year. Of course, men who have been diagnosed as permanently and totally disabled would have to be excluded, because they are drawing their insurance.

Another matter I would like to call your attention to, and that is the request of the War Risk Bureau that men totally and permanently disabled shall draw compensation of $100 a month. If any man on earth is entitled to consideration, it is the man who is temporarily disabled. The man who is permanently disabled knows his status; that he can never go out into the world; but the man who is temporarily disabled must get on his feet. He has his future ahead of him, and to pay a compensation that will enable him to have a few dollars in his pocket makes the outlook much brighter. Moreover, the man who is only temporarily totally disabled ceases to be a burden on the Government when he gets on his feet. It seems to me poor logic to say to a soldier, "You are only temporarily totally disabled, and while your disability is just as much as the man who is permanently disabled we can not see fit to pay you just as much as the man who is permanently disabled." If the man whose disability is permanent is to draw $100 per month for the balance of his natural life, would it not be fair to allow the same to the man whose disability is total, but only temporary, and who will only draw it for a few months?

The Government of Canada, so I understand, pays a soldier who is undergoing medical treatment the same pay that he receives when he is taking vocational training. Yesterday I met an enlisted man who was here on a furlough from one of the Canadian hospitals, and he told me that while in the hospital he received $105 a month. When he ascertained that I was—or, rather, had been—a captain of Field Artillery he wanted to know what allowance I received. I told him that I did not think the Government had settled the matter. I evaded the question, because I did not want him to know that while the Canadian Government paid a disabled private $105 who was undergoing medical treatment that my Government only allowed the sum of $30 per month, and then, too, I did have the feeling that the matter would be remedied, and I felt justified in answering him as I did.

You may be sure that whatever you do for us, whether to give us the same pay provided by the vocational training law or raise the compensation, that anything will be appreciated, provided, of course, it dates back and takes those of us in who were discharged before getting on our feet.

Thanking you again, and with sincere good wishes, I am,

Most respectfully,

A. L. YATES,
Late Captain, One hundred and forty-first Field Artillery.
Address A. L. Yates, United States Marine Hospital, Portland, Me.

AUGUST 5, 1919.

Capt. A. L. YATES,
United States Marine Hospital, Portland, Me.

DEAR CAPT. YATES: I have read with the very greatest interest your letter of August 4 and thank you for writing me at length.

As a result of my conferences with Assistant Secretary Shouse, various war-risk officials, and some of my colleagues in Congress who are especially interested, I introduced the inclosed bill, H. R. 8158, on Saturday. Yesterday I had a long conference with the chairman of the committee in charge, and I feel pretty certain that this bill or something like it will be favorably reported at an early date. I think the two points which you especially emphasize are cared for, the first by subsection 1 on page 1, which gives the vocational education act rates for total and temporary disability, and the second by subsection 9 on page 4, which makes the provisions of the bill retroactive.

I shall be very glad to have your further comment or criticisms.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN JACOB ROGERS.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 5 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has 31 minutes remaining.

Mr. SWEET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BOIES].

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, I dislike very much to take up five minutes' time, and but for the fact that I have been working constantly since the 5th of this month to get 5 or 10 minutes I would not presume upon your time now.

On last Friday the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], after a considerable criticism of the fact that Members of this House inserted into the RECORD matter that was not pertinent, that was silly, and had no place therein, saw fit to single me out because I had for the first time inserted three communications, and to observe that after examination it had been found that they did not amount to anything. The first communication that I introduced was a telegram from a wholesale groceryman in my district, calling attention to the fact that there was a very great scarcity of sugar in that town and in the State of Iowa. Representing that district, I thought I had a right to call the attention of Congress to it, and I asked that that telegram be inserted in the RECORD.

The same day I received a letter from an adjutant general, representing 210,000 soldiers of the late war, petitioning Congress directly. I thought it was my duty also to offer that communication for insertion in the RECORD. I received this morning another communication from that adjutant general, thanking me for the introduction of his former communication in the RECORD, and I will ask as a part of my remarks that that be inserted in the RECORD to-day.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOIES. No, sir. I do not intend to set off any fireworks here at this time. If any fireworks are set off because of this talk, some one else will apply the torch. But I think the gentleman from Missouri went far out of his way to criticize me. Even if he thought I was in error, it being my first offense, I can not imagine why he should call me out of my seclusion, unless it was, perhaps, something like the excuse the Mexicans gave for shooting at the American flyers along the border. They said that the flyers were flying too low, and frightened their mules, and they simply shot at them in order that they might fly higher. [Laughter.] If the gentleman from Missouri called me out of my seclusion and my timidity because he wanted me to fly higher, he ought to be more liberal and grant me time to become accustomed to my wings. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Iowa said something about including a letter in his remarks. I do not think we should be called upon to include in the RECORD all of the gentleman's correspondence, no matter how valuable it is.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. GARD. I object.

Mr. BOIES. I will then read it in the two minutes that I have remaining, if the Chair please.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman has surrendered back the balance of his time.

Mr. BOIES. I have not taken my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield two minutes to his colleague, to make it certain?

Mr. SWEET. I yielded five minutes to the gentleman and he used three. I now yield him two minutes more.

Mr. BOIES (reading)—

NATIONAL COUNCIL, WORLD WAR VETERANS,
Aurora, Ill., September 6, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM D. BOIES, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BOIES: Thank you for securing the insertion of our letter relative to the so-called "Mondell soldiers' settlement bill" in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 2, 1919.

We would not have Congress feel that the service men are trying to capitalize their simple duty to the Nation, and the men who served do not want to divide the wealth of the Nation, but it is a matter of crying need that something substantial be done for the immediate relief of the discharged service man. He is in a state of need, and the $60 bonus is inadequate.

You may be sure, sir, that so far as our organization is concerned, there is no petty fight in progress as to whether the American Legion is or is not; we are busy with our own particular business, and that is to organize and perfect the National Council World War Veterans, so that the returned service man who shall join our ranks may become the useful citizen the people of this Nation have every right to expect of him; but in bringing about this happy and natural event it will be necessary that the Nation really give evidence of some grateful regard and not dump the men upon the country without means to either clothe themselves or feed their bodies until such period may elapse that they may be properly employed.

Respectfully,
CHAS. M. RAPHUN,
Adjutant General.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have always been proud that the Congress enacted the war-risk insurance law and created under it a bureau whose duty it shall be to look after, first, soldiers' insurance; second, dependent families; and third, soldiers who were disabled during the great conflict.

There have been times when this great bureau has appeared to be moving slowly and ponderously in the discharge of its duties, but I doubt if the general public is aware of the enormity of this great undertaking. The writing of insurance for practically all of the 4,500,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines who entered this war will of necessity disclose what a monstrous task it was at the very beginning. The further fact that 13,500 employees, many of them untrained, were necessary to conduct this great bureau makes it apparent what a monstrous task it has been. The amount of money passing through the War Risk Insurance Bureau last year was $550,000,000. The Government's liability for outstanding insurance through the bureau is over $39,000,000,000.

The enormity of the task of the War Risk Insurance Bureau is shown quite well, I think, in the following estimates of expenditures of the bureau since its creation.

Over $241,000,000 has been distributed by the bureau to dependent families of soldiers as family allowances.

Fourteen million four hundred and fifty-eight thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars and seventy-seven cents has been paid by the bureau to disabled soldiers as compensation.

Insurance awards have caused already the expenditure of $51,672,197.99, and it is estimated that the total liability of the bureau on insurance to be paid on awards already made reaches the astounding total of $1,125,000,000.

In all history no Government has ever assumed such a gigantic task. I repeat, I was glad to vote for this law and help with its enactment, for I felt that it meant aid to the soldiers, aid to their dependent families, and aid to those soldiers who returned to their native country disabled in one form or another.

THE PRESENT LAW.

Under the present law, while the disability is total and pending the time when the soldier is nursed back to usefulness, either in part or in whole, the monthly schedule of compensation is as follows:

(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $30.
(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $45.
(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $55.
(d) If he has a wife and two children, $65.
(e) If he has a wife and three or more children living, $75.
(f) If he has no wife but one child living, $40, with $10 each for each additional child up to two.
(g) If he has a mother or father either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each.

THE PROPOSED LAW.

Under the bill H. R. 8778, which we now have before us for consideration, the amount paid to each of the disabled soldiers, as their relative rights appear, while the disability is rated as total and temporary the monthly compensation will be as follows:

(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $80.
(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $90.
(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $95.
(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, $100.
(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $90, with $5 for each additional child up to two.
(f) If he has a mother or father either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent.

The proposed law further provides that in addition to the increase just mentioned the director shall allow $20 per month to a disabled person who is so helpless as to be constantly in need of a nurse or attendant.

Members here and elsewhere will proclaim that we are paying the disabled soldiers a sum all out of proportion to any pension, bounty, or disability allowance ever given before. For me and mine that is not alarming; for me and mine that does not deter me from giving full and whole-hearted support to this measure. If in all the wide world there is one class of citizens that the Government should be generous with and should try to make full amends to it is the soldier who offered his all and who, as the battle raged on, sacrificed either all or part.

Money, of course, can do but little to repay the soldier who has lost a limb or limbs; money, of course, is such a poor recompense to one who has lost his hands, his hearing, or his eyesight. Money is such a poor recompense to the gallant soldier of yesterday who must to-day, to-morrow, and throughout his life hobble through a more or less miserable existence.

I repeat, there is so little that we can do to replace and make amends for the great sacrifice he has made that I say, without flinching and without a quiver for the taxpayers or the Treasury, in so far as an adequate compensation in dollars and cents can be given it shall be done.

I am not in favor of large standing armies in peace times. They are burdensome to the country; they are heavy for the taxpayer to carry. I do feel, however, that it is the duty of the Congress to deal justly, fairly, and even generously with the soldiers who served their country so valiantly during this terrible conflict.

I repeat, this legislation makes substantial increases in the compensation of disabled soldiers and their dependent families. As we glance over the schedule in the present law and the schedule in the proposed law the increases range from 100 to 166⅔ per cent. I repeat, this is not too much for a grateful Republic to do. It is no more than these soldiers are entitled to receive. For me and mine I shall hold myself in readiness, if need be, to increase it again and again until it shall be the remark of the passing throng that in a Republic like ours want and privation shall never stalk among the disabled soldiers who have served their country in time of peril. Mr. Speaker, I hope there may not be a dissenting vote upon the passage of this bill, for, as God is my keeper, it is but justice where justice is due. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] five minutes.

Mr. SWEET. I thank the gentleman, and I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the chairman of the committee who has the bill in charge very much indeed for the time that has been allotted me. It will, of course, be impossible for me to make any speech in the time allotted me of three minutes, but I desire to emphasize my appreciation and to join the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] in expressing my own appreciation, as a Representative of my district and the large number of soldiers in my district, of the splendid and constructive piece of legislation which has been presented to us for consideration in the pending bill.

I take it, sir, that it is our business here to address ourselves, as far as possible, in this great reconstruction period, to real constructive legislation, and I believe that we are all agreed that this bill, which is a very composite bill, is also a very comprehensive and complete bill. It covers a wide range as applied to the present war-risk insurance act, and as a piece of constructive legislation it reflects great honor on the committee that has brought it forth for our consideration. It is, indeed, noteworthy that this is submitted to us as a unanimous report both by the subcommittee and the entire Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Personally I wish to thank the committee for the consideration that they gave me in the hearings in the presentation of my arguments upon two bills which I introduced, one, House bill 5515, which deals with the terms of father and mother and persons who have stood in loco parentis to members of the military and naval forces, and my other bill, House bill 5907, which deals with men inducted into the service by the local draft boards who died in the service in the line of duty before they were reexamined by the camp physician at the place of mobilization. Both bills have been practically embodied in toto in this bill, the first in section 4a and the other in section 31.

May I be permitted to say further that this is legislation that gives expression on the part of Congress and the people of the United States for its gratitude to the soldiers, sailors, and marines and their dependent fathers, mothers, wives, and children for the great sacrifices that they made as they offered themselves freely on the altar of our country for the freedom of the world and for the liberty of mankind. [Applause.] In this constructive piece of legislation we are simply carrying out the pledge which we have made to the millions of soldiers, sailors, and marines and their families throughout the country when the boys were drafted by the local boards and sent to the camps preparatory to going across the sea to enter into the great conflict in the World War when we said: "When you come home we will remember what you have done for us and for America and for the world." [Applause.] By this legislation to-day we are simply redeeming the pledge which we have made to these millions of soldiers, their families, and dependents of our great country.

I wish to say further that in addition to this legislation which we have before us to to-day, as a continued expression of our gratitude to these boys, we should take early action upon one of the several bills introduced for additional pay to our soldiers, sailors, and marines of at least $30 a month for the length of time that they were in the service, deducting the $60 bonus which has already been given. I believe that the country is ready for such legislation. Wisconsin, my own State—the great Badger State of the Northwest—has in a most emphatic manner given evidence of the great heart of our American people toward the brave heroes of the World War when they voted in a referendum of a bill submitted by the legislature for a tax of $15,000,000 to give to each soldier, sailor, and marine of the World War enlisted from the State of Wisconsin additional pay in the amount of $10 a month for every month of service in the war, making a minimum payment to each soldier, sailor, and marine of $50. The referendum was carried by a vote of more than 4 to 1. In line with this unqualified expression by the State of Wisconsin and in line with what I believe to be the general expression of the people of the United States the Wisconsin delegation have to-day introduced a bill granting additional compensation to all soldiers, sailors, and marines and others who served in the armed forces of the United States in the war against Germany and Austria, giving them $30 additional pay for each month of service, deducting from same the bonus of $60 already granted by the United States Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, in my time I ask the Clerk to read an amendment which I desire to call to the especial attention of the gentlemen who have this bill in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAMSEYER: On page 11, line 5, strike out all after the word "who," all of lines 6, 7, 8, and, in lines 13 and 14, the words "unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, on the whole the subcommittee having this legislation in charge has done a mighty good job. I know it has been the purpose of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and also of the committee and of Congress, as far as that is possible, to propose such amendments and such legislation to the war-risk insurance act as would avoid special bills in the future for the relief of soldiers and sailors and their dependents. You have taken care of nearly every class of men under most all conceivable conditions, except one class of men, and that is those men who went to France and were killed or permanently disabled and who at the time of their death or injury had not taken out a policy of insurance.

In this bill, and especially in section 401, you give the benefits of automatic insurance to the men for a period of 120 days after enlistment. You go farther. You extend those benefits to the men during the period between their induction by a local board and acceptance at an Army camp. But there are a number of men who were killed or permanently injured on the battle line and who had at the time had no insurance. If you strike out the words that I propose, you extend the benefits of the automatic insurance to all men who were killed or permanently disabled during the period from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918. These cases should be taken care of, and my amendment will do that. I have a number of such cases in mind, one especially of a young man who went into the war as soon as it was declared, who was sent to France with the first transports, who soon developed into a crack rifle shot, and who with a squad of other men was sent to different places in France to train men in rifle shooting. This young man was at the front in the thick of the fight with the first Americans and was killed in October, 1918. No insurance can be found. His dependents are as much, if not more so, entitled to the benefits of automatic insurance as any class provided for in this section. I present this amendment now so the committee can consider it. I propose to offer it at the proper time. If adopted, it will extend the benefits of automatic insurance to all men who died or were permanently disabled during the period of the war, from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918. I am informed by some members of the committee that they want the benefits of automatic insurance so extended and thought the bill so provided. But a careful reading of this section convinces me that the adoption of my amendment is necessary to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, it is gratifying to me that this debate has taken the course it has, that it has not taken the course the debate usually has when we have had up for consideration amendments to the war-risk insurance act. The majority of the debates that we have had heretofore have been criticism of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and its acts. Usually it has not been a constructive criticism, but a very destructive one. I hold no brief to speak for the War Risk Insurance Bureau. I have been, as every one here knows, connected with this legislation ever since its adoption. I am under obligations to nobody in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for favors. There is not a man or a woman in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to-day who is there upon my recommendation. Therefore, I am under no obligations to them for any personal favors that they have granted me in the past or that they are granting to me now. I do want to say this, however, in answer to some criticisms that we hear. Some of them, most of them, I must say, come from men in this House who really are least competent to utter those criticisms, who know the least about the provisions of the law, and who know, in many instances, the least about the genius of the law and why it was put on the statute books. I know from my association with the men who have had charge of this bureau from the time it was established up to now that they have had no other purpose in the world than to serve the soldiers and the dependents of those soldiers. I know that many of them come here from other walks of life where they have been receiving much higher salaries than they have been paid here. Many of them have broken up business associations that have run for many years in order to come here at this time and try to help the Government, for the benefit of the soldiers of this country, and for those who are dependent upon them.

I would not have taken any time in general debate if it had not been for one or two amendments that have been suggested, and one answer of my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], which I believe to be a misconception of one provision of the bill, to which I shall take the liberty of referring. Section 4a reads:

(4a) The terms "father" and "mother" include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year: Provided, That this subdivision shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] in answer to a question said what I would in the first instance have said, that that was with reference to those who had stood in loco parentis for one year immediately preceding the induction of the man into the military or naval service. I am entirely convinced that that will not be the construction placed upon this law by those who will administer it, and that it would be most unfair if it were the interpretation placed upon it, and for this reason. In many instances, if that were so it would not include the cases we intended to include. It might be that some old woman had reared a boy from infancy up to the age of 15 or 17 or 18 years, that then he had gone away and had been doing for himself, when she herself was probably able to make a living, and that in her old age, when he was the only dependence she would have had, if he had stayed out of the Army this benefit would be taken away from her for the reason that she had not stood in that particular position for the 12 months immediately preceding the war. Therefore I think that what we mean to say in this bill is that anyone who has stood in the position of loco parentis to an enlisted man any year of his life will be a beneficiary under this amendment.

I wish to say, further, that we have had before us every Member who cared to come who had introduced a bill amending the war-risk insurance act. To show you that we considered their statements well and that the committee from its previous work understood the matter thoroughly, I would say that a great many men came before the committee with bills which they had introduced to correct evils in the law. After we had heard them and talked with them, they withdrew those amendments, and at the present time they believe they should not be enacted.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman a question that has come to me in a letter from the Bayfield County Chapter of the American Red Cross, which is as follows:

We also have a rather peculiar case of a soldier here who enlisted in the local National Guard company—organized solely for the participation in the war with Germany—who was drowned before the company was federalized and whose parents, although in need of assistance, have been unable to secure any help from the Government because of the fact that he was a State and not a national soldier. The amendments to the war-risk insurance act have taken care of many cases like this where men have been drafted but have not taken the oath of enlistment, and it seems to us it is rather unfair to the parents of boys who enlisted in National Guard companies in order to get into the game as soon as possible.

What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Would this war-risk insurance act as now amended include cases of this kind?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would not.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. May I further ask if it does not, would it be possible to amend the bill so as to include such cases; and, if so, where would be the proper place to make such amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I do not think there is any proper place in this bill to put in an amendment to cover somebody who has not been in the military or naval forces of the United States during this war. Now, I want to say this: It has been our purpose to make this law liberal enough so that it would satisfy every reasonable person in Congress and every reasonable claimant on the outside. It is the most liberal law that has ever been proposed to the Congress of the United States or the legislative branch of any government in the world. Therefore I think with the liberal provisions we have made this talk always about doing something for the soldier should cease, especially with reference to the war-risk insurance act. I said a moment ago there have been some suggestions made in relation to this law which were constructive and some which were destructive, and I want to say to you now that if you are going to adopt the amendment suggested here by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] or by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] you had better tear this bill up and disband the Bureau of War Risk Insurance now. I do not believe the soldiers of this country, or ex-soldiers, have reached the stage when they are willing or want to be put in a special class and raised and nurtured for the rest of their lives on a bottle furnished them by the United States Government. [Applause.]

This war-risk insurance act has done all that we intended it to do. Every mother in this land who lost a son to-day gets compensation; every mother in this land and every relative in the permitted class who has lost a relative that carried insurance is to-day the beneficiary of this act. But now when we are offering them converted insurance, from 15 to 20 per cent cheaper than they can get in any other company in the world, when the Government takes upon itself the responsibility of carrying the thousands of dollars of administrative expenses of this act, then come along these gentlemen who offer amendments to this act that this insurance shall be given free to these men for a period of two years. What situation would we find ourselves in then? A soldier the other day was met upon the street and this proposition was made to him, that an amendment was going to be made to give insurance for two years free, and the most natural question that came to his mind was, "Why not give it to us for life free?" Now, I want to tell you that this is the entering wedge. If you write into this law to-day making this insurance free for two years, why not three years, why not four years, why not five years, and why not for life?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I can not yield; I have but a few minutes. Thirty-nine billion dollars of insurance is in force in this country now, and at a time when these men are young, when they are healthy, when they can pay premiums into this fund which will in after years take care of this bureau and will help the Government carry the staggering load that will be placed upon it, we want at this time to start in not only not adding to the fund but depleting the fund that we already have built up in this bureau. Just think of it. The gentleman from Ohio said, "What if the soldiers of the Civil War instead of receiving pensions were called upon to pay insurance now?" If the soldiers of the Civil War had had the opportunity of this beneficent law, and had been allowed under this converted insurance to have taken out a policy, they would have had that policy paid out 34 years ago. [Applause.] But on top of that, more liberal than we have been to any veterans of any war, we offer them the higher compensation by double almost than any law that was ever even proposed in the Congress of the United States. They say we built up a fund down here of from two to three hundred millions of dollars. That is true; but the men who were fighting abroad under gunfire, who were paying this into the Treasury of the United States, were being protected by paying less than one-tenth of the rate that the Government was carrying. The Government of the United States carries more than 90 per cent of the risk that they assumed when they insured those men. They say that this bureau is going to break down, that these men are not going to reinsure unless——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not; I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAYBURN (continuing). Unless we give them the insurance. My God, had not the bureau better break down than to do that? But I am not going to shed any tears about men who did not convert their insurance. They had the opportunity to do so at a cheap rate. I am not so crazy about the Government going into business anyhow, and I never would have agreed to this insurance and the Government going into the insurance business if it had not been that we raised a draft army and we were taking men from their homes and their loved ones whether they wanted to or not, and therefore I was willing to make this act much more liberal in order that we may compensate the relatives and dependents in case they were taken away. Now, this insurance law has served its purpose already in this and the purpose for which we inaugurated it. But everyone of these men who went forth and fought in this war and was killed, for 120 days after he was enlisted, whether he had taken insurance or not, his relatives got $25, or $5,000 of paid-up insurance. Everyone who took out insurance who was killed or was totally disabled, his people to-day are getting $57.50 a month if he had $10,000 worth of insurance.

Then if this is taking care of all the people who were killed, if the compensation takes care of all who were injured, then why should we shed tears if these young gentlemen do not want to take out this insurance? If they had never been in a war, a great many of them would not have taken out insurance; a great many of them do not have any close relatives that they would want to inherit this; therefore, they do not want to deprive themselves of the money that they would pay in a premium. I tell you now that if you want the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to break down; if you want the morale of the men who have gone to war from this country to break down; if you want to undermine civilization in this or other lands, you should create the impression in the minds of men that they are and should be treated as a special and separate class. I know the soldiers of this war well enough to know that they are too brave and too patriotic to wish to be so made.

There is nothing too good to do and no compensation that in reason at all is too high for the man who went out and lost his life or his limb in this great struggle. I tell you now, you adopt the amendments proposed by these gentlemen and this bureau will go on and on, and it will never have paid into it from the outside a single dollar. If these gentlemen think that they can demagogue for the soldiers of this country by this thing, I ask them what they are going to do at the end of two years, when in all probability the soldier will be stronger in politics than he is to-day?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman talks about demagoguing. What does the gentleman propose should be done with the $225,000,000 that lies down there in the Treasury, taken out of the pay of the soldiers whose policies have lapsed?

Mr. RAYBURN. Whose policies have lapsed? Neither the Government nor any insurance company on earth owes a man anything until his policy has reached the place where it has a paid-up value. Who lets it lapse? The soldiers got the benefit of the protection all the time they were paying, did they not? This belongs to the Government because the Government carried this protection. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. What does the gentleman intend to do with it?

Mr. RAYBURN. This $225,000,000 is lying down there and being used to pay the $25 a month of automatic insurance and the $57.50 a month contract insurance for all the men who were killed.

Mr. McCULLOCH. For the one-fourth that is left. It can not be any other way. I want information from the gentleman. He is an expert on the subject and he ought to have the information.

Mr. RAYBURN. If you will ask me a sensible question——

Mr. McCULLOCH. I will do so. Under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act the Government contracted with the soldier to take care of all the hazards of war——

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly true. It did so. You will admit that, will you not?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I will admit they are doing so. I will not say "did so."

Mr. RAYBURN. They carried the risk of the insured, did they not?

Mr. McCULLOCH. The question of compensation is just developing now. It has not been paid yet. The gentleman knows that. They are doing so. That is my contention. However, that is not the point——

Mr. RAYBURN. Get to it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman would apply the $225,000,000 on the lapsed policies, paid in by the soldiers whose policies have lapsed, to take care of the other one-fourth?

Mr. RAYBURN. I would, because it is the Government's money.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I would not, because it is the soldiers' money.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman has no more idea about what a contract means and the performance of a contract means than that, there can be no controversy between him and me.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman is approaching the subject from the standpoint of a business proposition without the slightest consideration of the moral obligation of the Government for the soldier who was forced to take the insurance and from whose pay it was carried.

Mr. RAYBURN. No soldier of the Government was forced to take insurance, if the gentleman knows anything about the law.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I did not say the law did; but I say they were forced by the system to take it.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman does not state the facts when he says that they were forced to take it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I challenge the gentleman's statement that I do not state the facts.

Mr. RAYBURN. They have no power to do it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am talking about the facts and the gentleman is talking about the law. The gentleman must discriminate before he questions my statement, and he has not done so.

Mr. RAYBURN. I refuse to answer. I was willing to answer a question; but when I do so the gentleman goes off on a statement of his own.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 15 minutes, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] may have 10 minutes of that additional time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Five minutes will be all I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time be extended by the committee for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As to these policies that have lapsed, is there not provision in the bill for those persons who were thus insured to be reinstated within a certain time?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I was just coming to that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. It may be that he intended to cover that one, too. What would be the total expense to the Government to give two years' free insurance? And also I would like, after answering that, for the gentleman to state the different beneficiaries to whom this money might be paid in the event they were given this free insurance, with a view of showing it would not necessarily be a present to the soldier but it might be a present to some one who is not very closely dependent upon him?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know even approximately how much it would cost the Government to carry this insurance.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It would be the total amount received, more than half a billion dollars?

Mr. RAYBURN. More than half a billion dollars. And, of course, when you insure them free they are all in there and the Government is carrying the $39,000,000,000 liability. They say the soldiers are going to allow the insurance to lapse, and this bureau is going to break down for the simple reason that the soldiers do not have the money to continue their insurance and so have to let it lapse.

The Treasury Department has already made a ruling that the soldiers, from the time of discharge, shall have 18 months in which to apply for reinstatement, and that they can be reinstated in that time. Surely, a man can make up his mind in 18 months as to whether or not he wants insurance. But the difference in the Treasury Department's rulings and the amendments offered by these gentlemen is this, and it is a wide difference, and it is a difference that should appeal to us: The men are not insured for these 18 months. They are not paying for it. They are out of the service, and why should they get protection when they are not paying anything for it?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I want to know if I understand the situation correctly. When they are reinstated within these 18 months, my understanding is that they do not have to pay any back payment, but begin to pay from the time they are reinstated?

Mr. RAYBURN. They pay one month's back payment, and are reinstated at any time after their discharge from the Army. They simply have to file a statement to the effect that they are in as good physical condition as when they were released.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If a man can not bear the maximum, he can reduce it to a lower sum?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; down to $1,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman think that the lapse of policies comes from the solicitation of the old-line company's agents, who represent to the men that the Government insurance is not a desirable kind of policy for them to carry?

Mr. RAYBURN. That will enter into it to a small degree, for the reason that the old-line policy is a lump sum and the beneficiary class is not limited. But we have liberalized it in this law, so that the payment may be made within 36 months, and have widened the beneficiary class; and since the Government is carrying from 15 to 30 per cent of the cost of this insurance, I rather think we are justified in keeping the beneficiary class somewhat restricted.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that the agents of the old-line insurance companies will draw as poor a comparison as possible between the Government policy and the kind of policy they are trying to sell the men?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true, of course. But I understand the bureau is communicating with every man and laying before them the exact character of policy they are going to put out, and when this act is adopted, widening the beneficiary class, each man will be communicated with in reference to that. But how would giving him insurance for two years' help that situation?

Mr. TREADWAY. I see that; but I was trying to get at the gentleman's idea as to one of the reasons for the lapse of these policies.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is one reason.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman says the bureau is communicating with the men as speedily as possible. But there is quite a difference between a man receiving a formal letter and receiving a personal interview with a very clever talker.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true; and it is also true that if these young men had never been to war, young men from 21 to 30, who have no wives or immediate dependents, not a very great percentage of those fellows would take out insurance, even if they had never been in the war.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not better that the Government pay this insurance for a time in order that the whole amount, if possible, may be kept in full force?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is better in my opinion that the Government assume now the liability of about $1,000,000,000, or to be exact $1,380,000,000 of claims already accruing than to assume $39,000,000,000, which I think it will assume free if this two-year provision is adopted. Just as sure as you are living today, the same argument will be made at the end of two years, and probably a little more vehemently than now for this extension of benefit to the soldier, because a good many of us in all probability will come out of the next campaign pretty well scarred.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman realizes that a good many of the soldiers after coming back from the service have been unable to fit themselves into their old places. I have in mind a young man who went into the war and who sold a homestead and deposited the money in the bank, and the bank went broke while he was in the service. It seems to me as though he had made a tremendous sacrifice. He is not in shape to take up his insurance at the present time. I know that, and undoubtedly there are a number of cases of men similarly situated.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no doubt that is true. But they have 18 months in which to reinstate themselves.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. RANKHEAD. I would like the gentleman to discuss the question of 36 payments instead of 240, if the gentleman cares to discuss that.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is only one reason why I would agree to commuting the policy at all, and that is to make the policy more attractive. When the original act was brought in there was a provision in it for the commutation of the insurance, but the law was amended eliminating that, and I became thoroughly convinced long ago that that was a wise amendment to the original act that I reported.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I understood that three-fourths of the maximum number of policyholders had let their policies lapse. Is that true?

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand that is true.

Mr. SNYDER. Can anybody conceive that three-fourths of that maximum are unable to carry this insurance if they desired to carry it?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think more than half of them would be unable to carry it.

Mr. SNYDER. I think that the percentage of those that are unable, by reason of unemployment and not being able to fit themselves back into the positions they left, is very infinitesimal in comparison with the whole number. My belief is that the greater number have dropped out, because they did not carry insurance before, and they simply let it lapse because they wanted to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and unless it had been urged upon them they would not have had it now.
